In one of the principal buildings of the exposition is an exhibit of the oldest preserved electrical apparatus (in working order) of the great poet and statesman, Goethe. This apparatus was used by him for demonstrating the principles of frictional electricity. It is the property of the Goethe National Museum, Weimer, Saxony, Germany. Goethe's birthday was celebrated at the exposition and in the city of Frankfort. The following quotation (translated) was found in many prominent places, and especially at this exhibit, a view of which is shown in the illustration: "Electricity is the penetrating and all-pervading element which accompanies every material existence, and without hesitation we may consider it the soul of the world."

The world was made when man was born;
He must taste for himself the forbidden springs,
He can never take warning from old-fashioned things;
He must fight as a boy, he must drink as a youth,
He must kiss, he must love, he must swear to the truth

Of the friend of his soul; he must laugh to scorn
The hint of deceit in a woman's eyes
That are clear as the wells of Paradise.
And so he goes on till the world grows old,
Till his tongue has grown cautious, his heart has grown cold,
Till the smile leaves his mouth and the ring leaves his laugh,
And he shrinks the bright headache you ask him to quaff;
He grows formal with men and with women polite,
And distrustful of both when they're out of his sight;
Then he eats for his palate and drinks for his head,
And loves for his pleasure—and 'tis time he was dead.
—John Boyle O'Reilly.

"Woman in her Variety" is the title under which Gertrude Atherton has been for some time contributing to the literature of the country. There is very much sound sense as well as sentiment in these articles, but occasionally the gifted writer "kicks over the traces," so to speak, and gives utterance to impolitic ideas. Her last effort contains some most remarkable ideas on the marital relation, and its binding—rather lack of binding—effect. While advocating the general release of woman from the olden notions of wifely duty, and the limited privileges formerly granted to the female member of the life partnership, and commending the liberal marriage laws of California, she claims that the moral code of marriage is pretty sure to go by the board. "Human nature," says the lady, "in its perpetual changes, was never intended to endure one unvarying partner." This means that the wife will not in the future be compelled to continue the marriage relation longer than her caprice dictates. That she will at pleasure dissolve the marriage partnership, or at least select any temporary consort that may suit her fancy. This is pretty rebellious talk and advice to the wife. She justifies this idea by the assumed fact, that man has recognized this doctrine, and "calmly reclothes his idol whenever the fancy suits him." Woman, according to Mrs. Atherton's notion, should be allowed to make any change at her pleasure, and not be retarded by the slight circumstance that she has a husband. We feel called upon to correct the lady's legal conclusions regarding the rights of the control of the community property. She has fallen in error in the declaration that the wife's signature is necessary for any transfer of the community property. Under our codes the husband has the absolute control and management of the common property, and the wife's signature is not necessary to convey unless it is upon the homestead. We agree with the lawyer she mentions, "that the next legislature will be compelled to provide a law for the protection of married men," particularly if the doctrines held by Mrs. Atherton should prevail.

Professional Chat.

A Minneapolis lawyer entered a demurrer to an indictment against a prisoner charged with having shot several fine hogs belonging to a neighbor, on the ground that the shooting of the animals increased their value, as it saved the owner the expense of killing them.

The Supreme Court of the United States holds that in case of a suit for damages for injuries received, the defendant cannot compel the plaintiff to submit to an examination by medical men to ascertain the extent or permanent character of injuries. This upsets a series of decisions by western courts where suitors have been compelled to submit to the indignity of being pawed over by surgeons employed to prove that no injury had been sustained.

Bishop Fowler, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently gave this advice to some candidates for the ministry: "Don't come into the pulpit with a lot of empty platitudes and glittering generalities, but be equipped with something that will interest and help your congregation. I don't want you to copy from the books, but if, in order to have something to say, it becomes necessary to steal, then steal, but courageously acknowledge the theft."

A preacher in Iowa lost his pulpit for telling the truth. He was a forcible preacher, but deficient in education, and occasionally committed some grave misdemeanors in grammar. One Sunday evening while speaking rapidly he made a gross assault on Lindley Murray. No sooner had the sentence escaped his lips than he stopped and said: "I am aware that my education is deficient. I regret that I did not have the advantages of good schools while a boy. If I had been more fortunate I would now be preaching to a more intelligent congregation." The minister told the truth, but it was the last time he preached in that church.

English law has been freed of one of its eccentricities by the recent approval of the act providing that a woman may recover damages for slander imputing unchastity to her, even if there are no "special damages" shown. The English judges have spoken some strong words in criticism of the old law, or rather omission in the law, by which slanderous statements concerning a woman could be circulated with immunity. Each of the three appellate judges in a recent case expressed his regret that he was compelled to refuse damages to an aggrieved young woman, concerning whom a neighbor had made slanderous statements, the repetition of which caused the breaking of her engagement with a reputable young man.

One of the party at a table in a choice corner of the Hoffman House art gallery, in New York, the other night, said that when Col. "Bob" Ingersoll was in Europe last he visited Westminster Abbey for the first time. As he was contemplating the tomb of Nelson the guide said: "That, sir, his the tomb of the greatest naval hero Europe or the whole world ever knew—Lord Nelson. This marble sarcophagus weighs forty-two tons. Hinside that his a steel receptacle weighing twelve tons, and hinside that his a leaden casket, 'ermetically sealed, weighing hover two tons. Hinside that his a ma'ogony coffin 'olding the remains of the great 'ero." "Well," said the colonel, after thinking awhile, "I guess you've got him. If he ever gets out of that, cable me at my expense."

Nothing in Scotch law is called by the name used in any other country, and there is little to choose between reading a Scotch law case and one from the Indian law reports. A case just recorded in a Scottish law journal, for instance, arises in a "multiplepounding,"—whatever that may be—in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire. In the course of the proceedings two "riding claims" were lodged and action taken thereon by the court. A later action was "raised," or presumably "begun," on a bill drawn by the "pursuer," whom we should call the plaintiff, and accepted by the "defender," who would be known to us as a defendant. The decision turned on the doctrine of "reconvention," which may be very familiar in Scotland, but is not often spoken of in decisions in this country. The following sentence would certainly not be very plain to an American reader of the Scottish decision: "The defender's final objection, that the present action was not raised pending the multiplepounding, is disposed of by the fact that of two riding claims lodged under the defender's claim, one is still undetermined to the extent that the expenses in that riding claim are not ascertained, and a final interlocutor has still to be pronounced in the action of the multiplepounding." The designations of the judges are also very peculiar, as most of the titles would seem to belong rather to the inferior court officers. In the case referred to the trial was originally before a "Sheriff's Substitute," and on appeal was reversed by the "Sheriff," or higher judge. The decisions of the "Lord Justice-Clerk" and "Lord Justice-General" are referred to. The "Lord Justice-Clerk," instead of being a clerk at all, is a high judicial officer.

Green boughs of the eucalyptus tree are said to be among the best disinfectants known for a room where scarlet fever exists.

Woman is a greedy creature. She robbed man of a rib at the outset of her career, and she has been after his heart ever since.

Excessive taxation has in the past brought about prosperity; it brought about the establishment of the American government.

Wild dogs never bark, they simply whine and howl. Wise men say that barking is but an effort to speak on the part of the animal.

When the Japanese hitch a horse in the street they do so by tying his four legs together. Hitching posts are never used in Japan or Corea except by foreigners.

The procession and drills of the Grand Encampment I. O. O. F., Wednesday night, was about the grandest demonstration ever held in the city. It was most creditable to the noble order.

The coming man will be bald and toothless, opines that eminent anatomical authority the London Lancet, but somehow the pioneers in that line of development are not putting on any airs about it.

When Sacramento sends its formal card to Prosperity, will it be needed to inscribe upon it "55 per cent," or will $190,000 a year tribute be so explicit that the stare will become substantial and not derisive?

Judge Catlin, in his instructions to the grand jury, made some sharp criticisms of the partisan references in the Attorney-General's communication to that body. Possibly the thought was suggested to the Attorney-General by the apparent partisan character of the grand jury of San Francisco.

Londoners get their houses insured against burglary; and this kind of insurance will eventually reach the United States. With life insurance, fire insurance, tornado insurance, earthquake insurance, and burglar insurance, we shall be fully insured. Only very wealthy people, however, will be able to pay all the premiums.

The laughing plant of Arabia produces black, bean-like seeds, small doses of which, when dried and powdered, intoxicate like laughing gas. The victim dances, shouts, and laughs like a madman for about an hour, when he becomes exhausted and falls asleep, to awaken after several hours with no recollection of his wild antics.

The following is the thirty-sixth verse of the thirty-seventh chapter of the Book of Isaiah: "Then the angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand; and when they arose early in the morning, behold! they were all dead corpses." It would seem that "bulls" were not excluded, even from Holy writ.

If it was not for man's flattery and the looking glass, woman would not be so vain. We tell a woman she is pretty, and straightway she gets too proud to even recognize the one who praises her beauty. To the mirror and flattery can be attributed very much of the ills of humanity. The first social reform then, is to break the looking glass, and make it a penal offense to flatter a woman.

The house of a Moslem is always divided into two separate parts, the haaremlik and the selamlık. If the husband gives a dinner he can invite only gentlemen, and the guests can never intrude into the haaremlik. If the wife gives a reception no gentlemen are admitted to disturb the harmony. In all mosques, theaters, horse-cars, ferries, etc., special places are provided for women.

From the last census bulletin of date October 10, 1891, it appears that outside of the stock taken by the regular enumerators as "on farms," the investigation shows upon the ranges in California in the census year 1890, 241,300 cattle, 22,542 horses, 1,408 mules, 897,896 sheep, and 9,110 swine, with 1,782 men employed as herders and for the care of the stock. This bulletin discloses the fact that the stock ranges are rapidly giving place to agricultural and horticultural pursuits.

Judge Beatty is out in still another lengthy article in the News on the subject of the prosperity that is staring at Sacramento in the face of an annual tribute of $190,000 that it is figured out this people will have to pay into the hands of the bondholders for the next six years. It is a matter of entertainment that the iniquitous extravagance of the remote past should be bunched up and administered to the present inhabitants in doses of $190,000 a year for six years. Prosperity is not likely to travel far to locate in a community where the people are taxed for maintaining the state, county and city governments, and over whose heads there hangs, in addition, the princely tribute of $190,000 per annum.

Blue roses have hitherto been ranked among the things unattainable. By the most modern method of culture, however, all difficulties are said to vanish. For example, water a pure white rose continuously with a solution of Prussian blue, and the ensuing buds will take on a sympathetic tinge. In like manner proceed with green sulphate of copper, and hope for a similarly satisfactory result.

The modern newspaper is not, with all the boasted power and influence, a good agent for needed reforms. With them there is a constant tendency to kill all social or municipal reform by too much talk. Calm and deliberate discussion will often accomplish good results, while the bluster and censure of social or public management has the opposite effect. Corrupt politics, and an unhealthy social condition must be treated like a sick patient. The bitter medicine should be disguised.

The expression "man in the moon" is proverbial, but it has remained for Miss Callie Vivian, an accomplished young artist, to create the beautiful idea of a "woman in the moon." We observed at H. F. Dillman's, on exhibition, a splendid oil painting by this clever artist, which represents the crescent new moon with the vision of a beautiful daughter of Eve reclining in the crescent as the lunar light is passing through a floating cloud. The picture is indeed a vision of beauty and the work as well as the creation of an artist.

State Librarian W. D. Perkins, has compiled an index to the records of the Supreme Court of California on file in the State Library. This valuable compilation includes all the cases of which remittiturs were issued prior to September, 1890. As a book of reference and a ready guide to lawyers, it is of great value. An inspection by attorneys and courts of transcripts and briefs in cases is often necessary, and this work facilitates the search. The printing and binding was done by A. J. Johnston, State Printer.

There is no element in man's existence that is so fertile of human misery as discontent. Observe the happiest of all mortals and it will be found they possess the smallest number of those things generally regarded as necessary attributes of happiness. This is one of the strangest phases of human nature, that while four-fifths of the people are bitterly and with soured dispositions striving for that which they believe will assure them happiness, the other fifth is happy without it. To be satisfied with our condition is then the ultima thule, the absolute attainment of mortal happiness.

The London Lancet denounces as false the theory that abundant hair is a sign of bodily or mental strength in man. It says that despite the Samson precedent the Chinese are mostly bald, yet they form the most enduring of races. The average madhouse furnishes proof that long and thick hair is not a sign of intellectuality. The easily wheedled Esau was hairy, while the mighty Cæsar was bald. "Long-haired men are generally weak and fanatical, and men with scant hair are the philosophers and statesmen and soldiers of the world," it concludes, though of course to this rule there are many exceptions.

In the East people are frequently lectured on the sacred duty of kicking, but in the West kickers don't seem to be appreciated. "If you are a kicker," says a Western paper, "and see the shadow of a failure in everything that is proposed to help the town, for heaven's sake go into some cañon and kick your shadow on the clay bank, and thus give the men who are working to build up the town a chance. One long-faced, hollow-eyed, whining kicker can do more to keep away business than all drouths, short crops, chinch bugs, cyclones, and blizzards combined."

We think it would be wise, and advise the respective party central committees, to immediately appoint delegates to conventions for the purpose of nominating the educational officers and board of fifteen freeholders. The names of the nominees must be presented to the board of trustees thirty days prior to the election. The election occurs December 7th; therefore there is but little time. It would be wise for both the Republican and Democratic conventions to meet at the same time, in order that they may agree upon a non-partisan board of freeholders. In this particular matter there should be nothing of a partisan character. The combined wisdom should be exercised in selecting first-class men.

Men do not make occasions, but occasions make men. Occasions give men an opportunity to show themselves at their fullest and best; but, unless the occasion is a reality by itself, it can not be made an opportunity for the wisest and ablest of men to exhibit his exceptional powers. And the occasions that do most for men of ability are occasions of special need, or of special trial, or of special bewilderment and perplexity. Not the times that seem wholly favorable, but the times that seem altogether unpropitious, call loudest for men of character and ability to assert themselves by doing that which needs to be done, although it seems an impossibility. He who wants to make his mark in the world has reason to rejoice that everything seems against him in the line of his endeavors.

What means the backing and filling of the bond sovereigns concerning the improvement of the water-works pumps? First they are in it; then they are out. The best way to settle it will be to authorize private companies to compete in furnishing our people water. As it is, with excessive water rates, after the percentage demanded by the bondholders is taken out, there is not enough remaining to maintain the works, and the deficiency has to be made up by the transferring of moneys from other funds. The machinery is worn out and liable to break down at any moment, perhaps at a time that will expose our property to destruction by fire.

The iniquities of the father are visited on the child, and the child of the child. The inhabitants of cities so prosperous as Stockton, San Jose, Woodland, and others in the State perhaps do not appreciate this rule; the present population of Sacramento do; they are beckoning Prosperity, and holding out the tempting bait that we are to tax ourselves to death for the next six years with but a vague assurance that at the end of that time we will own our souls. Why go the sixth way? why not rally up old Prosperity by raising tribute enough to square up in one year? Justice is blind; Prosperity keeps its eyes open, and we feel its stare of curiosity.

There is novelty, at least, in the manner of presenting indictments by the San Francisco grand jury de facto. A witness is summoned before the jury and asked to explain some alleged charge against him. If he denies the accusation this great inquisition proceeds at once to indict for the offense of which he is accused, and further indict him for denying the accusation; in other words, indicts for perjury; for entering the plea of not guilty. This is what the de facto grand jury did with Hon. Elwood Bruner. It does seem to be a thinking man that there is considerable of the element of persecution in the case of Elwood Bruner.

It would be of interest to the people if the funded-debt commission were called upon to do that which is done by all other governmental boards and commissions: report formally at stated times to the people. It is now about all guesswork, so far as the status of the debt is concerned. There should be a report made to show the results of its management since 1872; a statement of the rating of the bonds each year, and the amount of money we have paid each year; the names of the holders of the bonds and the amounts they paid for them. As it is, little or no information is obtainable from the books of the city, and about all we have before us is the substantial $190,000 a year that is measured out for our dose, and the shadowy hope that in six years Myer, Davis and Bates will be satisfied.

The Month of Weddings.

Novelists and poets will have to revise their rhapsodies on "the leafy month of June" as the season when lovers build bowers and woo the hymeneal deity.

The crown that June has so long worn as the wedding month has been transferred to autumn-hued October. The columns of the newspapers are filled with accounts of society events in which a ring, two young people and a clergyman are the predominating features. The gentlemen with houses to rent and furniture to sell go about with smiling faces, and the marriage-license clerk resorts to Indian clubs to counteract the awkward effects of writers' cramp.

There is no disguising the fact that society has set the seal of its approval upon October as the wedding month. To search for reasons would be a task as futile as unnecessary. It is significant, however, that October is the month that immediately follows the close of the summer-resort season. There is just an inkling of a possibility that the American summer youth is responsible for the choice of October for weddings as a prompt and effective means of not allowing the summer girl to change her mind.

"The great Italian painter Titian," said he, "was so fond of red hair that he raved about it, and at one time is said to have offered to sell his soul to the devil provided his hair would turn red. This passion for red hair has raged fiercely since early times. About every eight years red hair comes in style, and the belles try to color their hair in conformity to the prevailing style. They often use poison, and that's where we come in. At one period in history, however, red hair was the subject of universal scoffing, and one old poet wrote of a girl who had jilted him:

"Malicious fame reports her hair was red,
That she smoothed it with a comb of lead."

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you.

Happy Thoughts.

A man can't love a woman he does not trust; women love men every day they can't trust.

It not unfrequently is the case that one friend makes a man more trouble than two enemies cause him.

A friend's help in your troubles never travels beyond the point where it affects his own interests.

The best-loved man is he who gives the most; he is also the one least regarded when he stops giving.

That men are different from women is considered by the men as a sufficient warrant for all their follies.

One very good reason why a man should tell the truth is, that it is not the tax on his memory that a lie would be.

It is all well enough to tell a man when he is in trouble to look at the bright side—the rub is to find the bright side to look at.

Use of Words.

Many words once written with dignified motive now cause us to read passages of standard literature with a guffaw. The word "imp" was once a term of high honor. But how now sounds the line from Spenser: "Ye sacred imps that on Parnasso dwell." Over many a grave of the old French nobles may be read the line: "Here lies that noble imp." A sacred poem, written by Gascoigne three centuries ago, begins a stately address to the posterity of Abraham with the words: "O Abraham's brats"—brat being then a word of stately meaning.

Opening an old dictionary at random one day my eye happened to fall on the word "tragedy." A note explained that it comes from a Greek word which means "A goat song;" because the oldest tragedies were exhibited when a goat was sacrificed or given as a prize to the best actor. The word "infant" means literally, "not speaking." Have you a pug dog? Did you ever think his face looks like that of a monkey? The monkey he most resembles is the pug monkey, which gets its name from Pug, or Puck as Shakespeare writes, the sprite of mischief.

Canter is an abbreviated form of Canterbury gallop, so called because pilgrims to Canterbury rode at the pace of a moderate gallop. A grocer, so says the dictionary, was originally one who sold by the gross. A "grenade" derives its name from its shape, which resembles a pomegranate. A "biscuit" means "twice baked," because, according to military practice, the bread or biscuits of the Romans were twice prepared in the ovens. Did you ever notice the leaves of the dandelion? They are said to resemble in form and size the tooth of the lion; and so the French call it the dent de lion and we the "dandelion."

The pope was formerly called the "pape," which means the same as "papa" or father. Vinegar comes from two Latin words—vin and acer—meaning "vine" and "sour." These are only a few of the many curious and interesting things I found in my afternoon search in the old dictionary. When you are at a loss for something to do, follow my example, and you will be surprised at the many bits of information you can pick up in a little time.

Want of Money.

One of the greatest miseries is a want of money. It is wretched to have to confront a just and oft-repeated demand, and to be without the means to satisfy it; to deceive the confidence that has been placed in you; to forfeit your credit; to be placed at the power of another; to be indebted to his lenity; to stand convicted of having played the knave or the fool, and to have no way left to escape contempt but by incurring pity. The suddenly meeting a creditor, on turning a corner of the street, whom you have been trying to avoid for months, and had persuaded you were several hundred miles off, shatters the nerve.—New York Ledger.

He Took a Hint.

"Well, good-night, Miss A—," said a young man the other evening to a girl whom he was visiting. "I think it's better for me to go. I feel certain that if I stay two minutes longer I shall be indiscreet enough to kiss you." "Well, good-night, Mr. P—," replied the young girl. "Oh, by the way," she added, "I want to show you my sachet bag before you go. It will only take a couple of minutes." It is only necessary to state that the young man in question is possessor of a bright intellect, and he quickly embraced the situation, and we can further assert that the girl was in it.

A recent editorial in the London Times discovers a fearful (possible) danger in the opening up of the American market to English authors. It will, fears the Thunderer, result in a deteriorated quality of literary work. "The desire to please a large and uncultivated public may degrade the character of English literature." This is an underhanded way of insulting the moral conscience of the British artists. If they had been guilty of such degradation the small islands of Great Britain would have furnished them plenty of incentive long ago, both in size of population and in abject uncultivation.

Roller Fun.

To-night the skating rink will open at the old pavilion. The lovers of this fun can be fully satisfied, as everything has been arranged to make the rink inviting. J. M. Sullivan is the proprietor, and has spared no pains to make the entertainments attractive. In addition to the "rollers," there will be trick bicycle riding. During the season the manager intends to add new features to the exhibitions.

Providence Isn't In It.

An able young Republican, with an office in the neighbor of the city hall, says the Detroit Free Press, wanted to go down into Ohio to make a stump speech or two during the campaign to sort of get his hand in for future usefulness, don't you know; but he didn't make it. He prepared what he thought was a brilliant effort, and submitted it to an old wheel-horse in politics who was selecting stump talent.

"Rats!" exclaimed the old hand when the young man went around to see him after he had read the speech.

"What's the matter?" exclaimed the shocked applicant.

"Take that speech away and hide it till you get older and know more."

"What's the matter with it? It's a good speech, and I was a whole week in getting it ready."

"Good nothing!" blustered the old one. "It's lacking in the very first principles of a political speech."

"Show me where it is wrong."

"Ah! it's wrong all over, and right at the end, where the work ought to be, you've queered the whole business."

"In what way?"

"Why, look at it;" and he pointed at the offending passage. "There you say with a grand flourish: 'And it is only reasonable that the people, and especially the farmers, should feel a profound and heartfelt gratefulness to an all-wise and beneficent Providence for the abundant crops which cover the fields with fatness, and smile at the generous granaries waiting to receive them.'"

"Isn't that all right?"

"Of course it isn't. You don't know a little bit. Providence is not in it. You ought to have credited all that to the McKinley bill and the Republican administration, where it belonged. 'A beneficent Providence' indeed! You make me tired. Here, take your speech. We can't trust you away from home till you've cut your wisdom teeth."

The famous old saying about "Hobson's choice" comes from Mr. Tobias Hobson, of Cambridge, England, who amassed a fortune in what we would call the livery business, and always kept forty steeds ready for mounting. It was an inflexible rule that customers should choose the nag nearest the stable door, and so all fared evenly, fortune allotting the best chargers. There is an old print of Mr. Hobson, showing him with a bag of too sovereigns in his hand and the motto. "The fruitful mother of a hundred more."

Land of the Midnight Sun.

Iceland to-day is far behind civilization. It is a peep into the past to find a living people grinding corn with the same kind of huge stones as in the ancient world; weaving their own clothing and linen in hand looms and churning butter in the tall, old-fashion churns worked by pulling a rod up and down by hand. Money is of little value; barter remains the chief means for the exchange of goods.

There is no telegraphic communication with the island, and during the six months of the year it is icebound the Icelanders are entirely cut off from the outside world. They are so left to indoor occupations during the winter's darkness that education reaches a very high standard. Everyone on the island can read and write, and many of the peasants understand another language besides their own, although many well-known works have been translated into Icelandic.

Coffee can always be procured, and fish is always to be had near the coast. Skyr can be found everywhere. Skyr is the Icelandic national dish. It is made from the sheep's milk which has gone sour, curdled in fact, and is eaten with sugar. It is really not at all bad, very nutritious, and does one no harm. The milk is collected into huge tubs during the time the sheep are in full milk, and there it remains, often for months, before it is used; indeed, what is made in the autumn lasts till the following spring.

From May to September there is no night in Iceland, and the midnight sun is visible during July and August. Eternal daylight sounds charming, but trying to sleep in a tent in the light of day is not so charming in practice. The want of light, of the moon, of stars, makes the constant light very monotonous and trying, but nothing to what an equal length of darkness must be to the poor natives. An enterprising Glasgow merchant wished to show the Icelanders the advantage of electric light as a means of cheering their long winter's darkness. He sent forth a proclamation inviting the natives to come on board his steam yacht at Reikjavik and behold for themselves the scientific wonder. It was August; the night never came, and the wonderful display was totally ineffectual.

The Icelanders are stolid, hard-working people, silent, slow in their ways, not too cleanly, but thoroughly honest in all their dealings. Icelandic women are good-looking; at least the younger ones are; but, like every other country where women work hard, they soon get old. Their costumes are very pretty and the cap quaint. The hufa are finely knitted black skull caps, quite small, from which hangs a tassel of black silk from six to ten inches long, which passes at the top through a silver tube, often prettily engraved. The men are short, broad, thickly set, and, with their furs and saffron-colored comforters, surmounted by shaggy red heads and beards, have a very quaint appearance. Men, women and children all wear skin shoes made from the seal, cut out and sewn together to the shape of the foot and pointed at the toe. They are tied on by strings of gut. They all wear double-thumbed gloves. These gloves have no fingers, but are made like a baby's glove, only with a thumb at each side instead of only one. When the palm wears out, the Icelandic simply reverses the gloves and makes use of the other thumb. The natives always wear gloves, whether rowing, riding, fishing, washing or sewing.

Men always kiss when they meet, but I only once saw a man kiss a woman. Up country everyone shakes hands or takes off the cap to anyone they meet on the lonely path, and wishes them Godspeed on their way. They are polite, but they rarely smile. Box and Cox was played once in Reikjavik, and the natives laughed so heartily that they felt the effects weeks afterwards.

Everyone who visits Iceland must be prepared to walk. There is not a vehicle on the island, and there is not a road, excepting for a mile or two out of Reikjavik, on the way to the geysers.—London Queen.

The Girl Who Is Suspicious.

She is the most uncomfortable girl to live with in the world. She is as full of vanity as a peacock, or else she would not be thinking that everybody is interested in her. If you ask an intimate friend a question that she doesn't hear, she concludes you are criticizing her; if you know some people she doesn't know, and to whom you don't care to introduce her, she is certain it is because you are jealous of her. Don't be like that girl. Carry around a mental mirror; take the brush of hope and sweep out the suspicious cobwebs from your brain.

Afraid He'd Run Into the Sea.

An American on his first trip on an English railway quite held his breath at the rapid running. When his nervousness rather overcame him he approached the guard.

"I say, guard," he ventured, "this is pretty fast travel for safety, isn't it?"

"Oh, no, sir," replied the guard; "we never run off the line here, sir."

"But," said the Yankee, quickly resenting the patronage, "it is not the line; I'm afraid of running off your blanked little island."

Words hurt more than blows, and heal more than balsams.

People do not grow in grace by looking at the faults of others.

Discontent is the want of self-reliance; it is infirmity of will.

We lose the peace of years when we hunt after the rapture of moments.

That man's end is easy and happy whom death finds with a weak body and strong soul.

There are people who never give away any milk until after they skim it, and then they want credit for cream.

Naval Flag Signals.

An admiral's flag is square, with four stars in a diamond on a blue ground; a vice-admiral's has three stars, forming half a diamond, says the New York Commercial. Rear admirals have three flags, according to rank, viz.: blue, with two white stars in the center of field, one above the other; red, with two white stars; white, with two blue stars. Commodores have also three flags—blue, red, white, swallow-tail, bearing one star in center of field.

The secretary of the navy floats a blue square flag—a foul anchor, surrounded by several stars. This flag came into use in 1866.

When the President comes on board a United States vessel a blue square flag containing the arms of the United States is hoisted at the main, honored with a salute of twenty-one guns, and remains aloft while the President remains on board. The Vice-President is received with the American ensign at the fore.

A flag of truce is a white flag displayed to an enemy to indicate a desire for a parley or consultation.

The red flag is a mark of danger, and shows a vessel to be receiving or discharging powder.

The black is the symbol of piracy. The yellow flag belongs to the quarantine service, and when displayed is a sign of contagious disease.

A convoy flag is white, triangular in shape, bordered with red, and is worn by men-of-war when convoying merchant vessels.

A pilot flag is the jack, bordered with red, hoisted at the fore.

A compass flag is a square flag, divided into four squares or cantons—blue, yellow, white, red—hoisted over the numeral flags of the compass.

A dispatch flag is a white, square flag with five blue crosses, generally known as the five-of-clubs; hoisted forward denotes important and urgent special service which must not be interfered with by any officer junior to the one by whom it was dispatched.

A church pennant is a white pennant, without swallow-tails, charged with a blue Latin cross, hoisted at the peak during divine service, over the ensign.

The cornet is a square flag divided into four equal parts of alternate red and white, and when hoisted anywhere without other flags is a peremptory order for all absent boats and officers to return on board without delay. It is also a signal for sailing, and has long been used in the navy for that purpose.

To strike the flag is to lower the national colors. A flag at half-mast means that a death has occurred, and hoisted union down is a signal of distress. Dipping the colors is lowering the ensign some distance and then hoisting it again to salute a vessel or fort.

The Man Who Forgot to Dine.

Shelley could not understand why people wanted more than plain bread. He was so careless about his meals that he did himself serious injury. When during his London walks he felt hungry he would buy a loaf at the nearest baker's, tuck it under his arm and eat it as he went along, probably reading a book and dodging the passers-by at the same time. Mrs. Shelley often sent food to his study, which in his abstraction he forgot, and then, coming out from the room, he would innocently ask: "Mary, have I dined?" This reminds one of the preoccupation of Sir Isaac Newton, who is said not always to have remembered whether he had dined or not; and of the practical joke once played by a friend, who ate the philosopher's dinner, a chicken, which was waiting for him, and then leaving the bones on his plate, he was amused at the unconsciousness of Newton when he came into the room that he had not dined.

A strange history might be written of the misfortunes which have befallen all the women who have been raised from the ranks of the people to seats on the thrones of Europe. Josephine de Beauharnais, her daughter, Queen Hortense; Eugénie de Montijo and Nathalie de Ketchko have each in turn contributed mournful chapters to the history of the heroines of royal romance, and have paid dearly for their greatness.

How the Fruit Turned Red.

One day when September was leaving the orchard,
Cheerily singing her pastoral song
And twirling a garland, she met young October,
Brown as a berry, a-coming along.

They met and were glad, for they loved one another.

She flew to his arms like an innocent dove;
And the birds twittered sweetly and called to each other,

And even the winds seemed to whisper,
"In love!"

They kissed, and the leaves on the trees all about them

Fluttered and rustled and visibly flushed;
The peach and the pear and the quince and the apple

Saw the sweet sight, and on seeing it—blushed.

The Woman in a Hotel.

A woman in a hotel is worth seeing. She rings the bell three times to a man's once. She apologizes and explains so profusely to the bell boy that he comes down stairs with not an idea of what he is to do. She writes about eight letters a day, and each envelope seems to contain at least three sheets of the hotel's paper. She sends the missives down one by one to be posted, and "Ask the office, please, to put a stamp on for me," she says each time. She never makes out a wash list, but she "knows" just what she had, and one pair hasn't been returned. She refuses indignantly to confide more to "the office" when he inquires, but she is sure just how many were in, and "these have blue ribbons." She always regards the clerk as "the office," but he has his feelings and his modesty, just as if he were a person.

She puts all sorts of things in the safe, but she is perfectly sure she put several things there that she didn't put there, and of course this makes it awkward for "the office," because he can't prove anything, and she always "knows." She is always thunderstruck at the amounts paid for her bills, and she "knows" there is a mistake. The bills have to be produced, and even then she does not remember receiving the goods at all, or buying them, or anything. If she remembers afterward, she comes down and explains to "the office" and apologizes, which makes him feel better. Sometimes she gets conscience smitten about ringing the bell so much, and then she runs out, rings up the elevator, and gives the elevator boy orders. Yet people wonder at so many elevator disasters. An elevator boy's life has its ups and downs anyhow, but when the women come to giving him messages, he loses his grip altogether, and the elevator may take advantage of him.

The woman in a hotel expects a chambermaid to "see to" this, that, and the other thing. Sewing on a button, taking a stitch, hanging up her dresses, and helping her put them on. The chambermaid is only a poor human being, who has a lot of work to do, and the housekeeper to keep an eye on, but what of that? The lady asks her just the same: "Iron these out for me, Mary—there's a good girl;" or to "lace up my dress, there's a dear;" or to "put me in a few extra towels, do;" or "get me a cake of soap—I'm leaving this afternoon." She tacks photographs up on the wall—that she will do—and she cries right in the office before every one when she is charged extra for damage to walls. Then, cards and callers! Oh, heaven, give "the office" patience.

"I expect a gentleman to call about 9," she remarks; "please say I am out. If any one else comes send them right up."

The gentleman is late, and gets sent up. Heaven help "the office."

When a card awaits her she takes "the office" right into her confidence.

"Oh, dear, I'm so sorry," she exclaims. "When did they call?" "Oh, yes; the time is on the card. If you had only told them to wait. I know I didn't leave instructions; but then, you see, I had no idea they would call. I didn't even know they were in town. Was the baby along, too?" "Oh, dear, I've never seen the baby. It was only born last summer, and—"

"The office" is perhaps not a married man, or perhaps he is, and in either case this is harrowing, with a whole line of impatient men waiting for rooms. You understand now, don't you, why so few hotels have "the office" where the women can get at it.

Indubitable Proof.

Great Lawyer (in cross-examination)—Huh! You consider the prisoner an honest man, do you?

Witness—An honest man never lived.

Great Lawyer (superciliously)—Will you kindly state on what you base that remarkable opinion?

Witness (hotly)—On the fact that he once tried to be a lawyer, and failed.

"The church seems to be packed," said the man on the outside as he paused to look in at the door. "Are they taking a lot of new converts into membership?" "Converts nuthin!" whispered the sexton. "We don't have any converts at this church. We're tryin' a man for heresy."

Georgia Justice.

In Americus the other day I witnessed the funniest trial in a justice court that I have struck yet.

Justice Oliver was on the bench and the court-room was crowded, says the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal. All the young lawyers and a number of the older ones were in attendance, and the plaintiff and defendant in the case each had many adherents and retainers present. A little dominicker rooster, whose comb was just sprouting, was the cause of contention.

Aunt Sylvy Gibson was the plaintiff and Mrs. Patsy Johnson the defendant.

"Let the court come to order, now; and if you don't keep quiet I shall set the hair on somebody, shore," remarked the judge, as he changed sides with his quid and settled himself in his seat.

"Now, Aunt Sylvy," said her attorney, "tell the court on what you base your claim to this chicken."

"I ain't des er claimin' nothin', boss, 'case I don't hafter claim. Dat's my rooster. Dat same dominicker rooster was hatched under my baid—"

"Tain't no such fmg, Mars' Oliver," said Mis' Johnson, "case I dun fotch up dat—"

"Order in court; and shet up, Patsy, till the first side is through."

"Well, I'll hush ef I 'bleged to, but de Lawd knows dat's my—"

"No, 'tain't, Patsy, an' you knows it, too. Dient I see de hen wen she laid dat aigg in the little handle-basket under my baid, in my own house? an' don't I know the daddy o' that rooster? W'y Mars' Oliver, he des do ve'y spit out'e de mouf o' his pa; an' I ain't gwinter tell a lie—"

"Stick to the case, Sylvy, or I'll set the hair on you."

"She don't stick to nothin'," put in Patsy. "I know old Sylvy ever since freedom died an' de wah brake—"

"Shet up! I tell you, Patsy, or I'll shore set the hair on you both. Go on, Sylvy."

"Well, Mars' Oliver, I dun tol' you, an' its lack, I say. De she w'at mammy o' dat rooster, she laid nine aiggs, she did, an' den she was boun'er set, wedder for no; so I borried free aiggs—"

"Dar now; didn't I tell you so? She claim she know who dat chicken's pa, Mars' Oliver; an' you see now how she borried aiggs? Hmumph! I tell you hit tek's smart folks ter tell who is dey pa, much less'n er little ol' dominicker rooster wa't ain't got no spurs yit."

"Patsy, I warned you to shet up; an' I tell you once for all, if you interrupt the witness again I'll set the hair on you shore enough."

"Well, Mars' Oliver, wen dat hen sot de time out she foch off nine chickens—six pullets an' free roosters, an' dey wus free aiggs rotten. See dar, now, Mis' Johnson, w'at vo' gwinter do wid dem free rotten aiggs? Say, 'oman?"

"Oh, thunder and blazes! I'm tired of this foolishness. Here, Tobe Cobb, I put that 'ere rooster under bonds to appear before me at the next regular term, the second Monday in October; and I 'pint you his bondsman. Court's dismissed."

Queer Catches.

I saw a blazing comet pour down hail
I saw a cloud all wrapt with ivy 'round
I saw a lofty oak creep on the ground
I saw a beetle swallow up a whale
I saw a foaming sea brimful of ale
I saw a pewter cup sixteen feet deep
I saw a well full of men's tears that weep
I saw wet eyes in flames of living fire

If a semicolon be placed after the noun in each line except the last, this absurd jingle will be resolved into sobriety. Here is what the Shakespearean commentators call a "var."

I saw a pack of cards gnawing a bone;
I saw a dog seated on Britain's throne;
I saw King George shut up within a box;
I saw an orange driving a fat ox;
I saw a butcher not a twelvemonth old;
I saw a greatcoat all of solid gold;
I saw two buttons telling of their dreams;
I saw my friends who wished I'd quit these themes.

"Out of the Frying Pan," Etc.

The district assessor was out walking with his wife.

"Ah, here comes that fussy old Judge Misery and his tiresome better-half. I don't want to meet them."

"Quick, then; quick in here," said his quick-witted wife; and, opening an adjacent store door, she hurried the luckless man into a store where the season's dearest bonnets were just being put on sale.

The fur and nails on rabbits' feet are said to be of unusual length this fall, indicating a long, cold winter. The fur is to keep the animal warm, and the nails are to scratch in the snow and ice that will cover the ground. The heavy husks on the ears of corn, and the extraordinary size of pumpkins, are also claimed by rural prognosticators to be tokens of a severe winter.

The Judge Fined Himself.

Perhaps the most disgusted man in Somerset county is a justice of the peace, who is the owner of a fine garden, the pride of his heart. The other day he was informed that an unruly cow had wrought desolation in his Eden, and he at once ordered the animal sent to the pound. Then he went up to view the wreck; and after noting the vacant places where the beets and corn had been, the trampled-down squashes and cabbages and the demoralized pea vines and sunflowers, and ascertaining, as he supposed, the owner of the cow, he made out a writ against that individual, containing fourteen different and distinct counts, including trespass, forcible entry, malicious mischief, nuisance, riotous and disorderly conduct, and assault and battery with intent to kill.

It was then that he learned that the trespasser was his own cow; and his ire cooled as he meekly paid a field driver for getting her out of the pound.—Fairfield (Me.) Journal.

Praying in Spirit.

I need not leave the jostling world,
Or wait till daily tasks are o'er,
To fold my palms in secret prayer
Within the close-shut closet door.

There is a viewless, cloistered room
As high as heaven, as fair as day,
Where, though my feet may join the throng,
My soul can enter in and pray.

When I have banished wayward thoughts,
Of sinful works the fruitful seed;
When folly wins my thoughts no more,
The closet door is shut, indeed.

No human step approaching breaks
The blissful silence of the place;
No shadow steals across the light
That falls from my Redeemer's face.

And never through those crystal walls
The clash of life can pierce its way,
Nor ever can a human ear
Drink in the spirit words I say.

One hearing, even, cannot know
When I have crossed the threshold o'er,
For He alone who hears my prayer
Has heard the shutting of the door.
—Harriet McEwen Kimball.

A WIFE'S RUSE.

"The more fool you, Nora; I wouldn't spend another day of my life tied to the drunken sot."

"Aunt, when I married Sy I took him as my husband, for better or worse, and better or worse, I'll stick to him; besides, you know, while there's life there's hope. Sy never drank till baby died. She was the light of his eyes, and her death broke his heart. It does seem as though he would never get over it."

"Get over it, why that was two years ago, and Sy Martin has been drunk ever since. Broke his heart indeed! Some one ought to break his head. He'll have you both in the poorhouse yet with his drinking."

"No, aunt; not while I have strength to take in sewing. The house, you know, father needed to me. He can't drink that up; but I am not going to stay here and hear you abuse my husband. You were loud in your praise of him before I married him."

"Yes, for then he was the brightest and smartest young man in town. Prosperous in business, and head over heels in love with you. And now, what is he?"

"My husband, and loves me yet, as dearly as ever."

"Poor way of showing it, breaking your heart and neglecting you for whisky. He must love the whisky better than he does you."

"No, he don't, aunt," sobbed Nora, "but he just can't quit it."

"Then, Nora, dear, just quit him; that's my advice."

"Never, aunt; baby's loss made him what he has been for the past two years, and should I leave him he would never be sober again. No, aunt, for better or worse, I'll stick to my husband." And Nora left her aunt's residence and went home.

Five years before Nora had married Cyrus Martin, who, as her aunt had said, was the brightest and smartest young man in the town, and was a young lawyer of acknowledged ability; and very happy they were until death entered their home when they had been married but three years, and bore away their only child. The blow fell with a crushing weight upon the father, and he had rarely seen a sober day and night since; and all of Nora's endeavors to induce him to become and stay sober had been of no avail. To be sure, he would leave the house sober in the morning, or nearly so, and with the best of resolves, but somehow the resolves would all be dissipated before night, and he would come staggering home drunk. He was never quarrelsome, but just stupid drunk. He'd stagger in and kiss his wife, and commence to talk about the little Nora that was gone till the tears ran down his cheeks; and Nora, poor thing, would be crying too, and get her drunken husband off to bed.

For two years Nora had led this kind of a life with her husband. He no longer tried to do any business. He could not attend to any. He still kept his office down town and he'd visit it in the morning, perhaps read a column or two of the morning paper, and at least every half hour visit the corner, where the sign above the door read: "Family Liquor Store." And when he got pretty tolerably drunk, why he'd send for a bottle and lie on the sofa in the back office and drink and doze, and doze and drink till night. Day after day it was the same thing. Nora would say to him every morning:

"Now, dear, do not drink to-day," and his reply would always be:

"No, darling; I will try and abandon it," but at night he was drunk again. Nora realized that but for her care he would look much more like a sot; in fact, that he would soon become an object of pity and charity, and soon fill a drunkard's grave; and to her aunt and old friends who advised her to leave him, she always had the same answer:

"For better or worse, he is my husband; I will never leave him," and yet must this life continue till the end. Old friends who formerly visited her seldom called now. She was nearly heartbroken. All source of income from her husband's profession of law had ceased, and their bank account had dwindled away to nothing.

One morning, a week or ten days after her last conversation with her aunt, as Sy was getting ready to go down town, the door-bell rang. Sy opened the door and a boy came in with a bundle. Nora hastened forward, but the boy failed to notice the warning shake of her head.

"Mrs. Martin, here's these shirts. There's two dozen of them. Mr. Schwartz says he'll send for them Friday. He says please take a little more pains with the button-holes, and here's the money for the last lot, $3 75. I'll call Friday," and the boy was gone.

"Why, Nora, what is the meaning of this?" said Sy, and he unrolled the bundle and disclosed material, cut ready for the seamstress for two dozen shirts.

"Sy, dear," said Nora, and tears sprang to her eyes. "When I finish this two dozen, I will have made twelve dozen shirts for Schwartz & Jacobs. You know, dear, our money is all gone now, and I must do it."

Sy took her in his arms and their tears mingled together. "Darling, did I become your husband for this? No, I have been a brute, but the end has come, dear; I will become the Cyrus Martin of old."

"Oh, husband, that is all I want to make me happy; but these shirts—"

"They go back unmade. You shall never make another shirt for Schwartz & Jacobs or any one else."

"But, dear, I'd better keep on till you get established again."

He wouldn't hear to it, he wrapped up the bundle himself, kissed his wife good-by at the door, and on his way to the office left it at the store.

"Mr. Schwartz, you need send no more shirts to my house, for my wife can't make them."

"She vos anxious to got dot work in ze first place," said Schwartz.

"Well, I am anxious now that she get it no more. I am quite competent to provide for my family."

"Yes, you vos, if you keep sober; but vill you—can you?"

"Can I? yes. You have known me for years; do you doubt my ability?"

"I know you vos got plenty of ability, but ven a man has been drunk two or three years, den he don't can stop drinking."

"Two or three years!"

"Yes, dot is right. You have been drunk ever since you lost dot little girl, but if you stop drinking, we gife you back our business again, and we hafe got lots of id."

"Thanks, Mr. Schwartz; I shall be ready for it at any time;" and yet that very night Sy Martin staggered up the steps home, drunk.

Then poor Nora nearly gave up hope. She put him to bed as usual, and cried as though her heart would break, and she could go to neither her aunt nor old friends for consolation. She knew just what their words would be.

"Nora, quit the toper," and she had taken him for better or worse. "Was it all worse?"

The next morning Sy felt like a doomed mortal, for he realized more fully than ever before how hard it was to get free from his enemy. "Oh, Nora," said he, "but for you I would end the struggle by taking my life."

That day he decided to remain at home and commence a fight for reformation, but Nora could see that as it got on toward mid-day he seemed very restless and uneasy. She prepared dinner, and when she went to call him he was gone. Poor Sy! he had stood it as long as he could. That terrible nervous strain he could stand no longer. But one thing would relieve it—whisky—and Sy had gone to the family liquor store.

Nora left the dinner on the table and hastened down town. Her husband was not much ahead of her; she nearly caught up with him. She saw him enter the door of the liquor store. She glanced through the half-open door and saw him raise to his lips with trembling hand the glass of fiery liquid.

"Poor Sy," she said to herself, "drunk again to-night;" and she hastened around the corner before he came out. He walked down toward his useless office, and she entered the side entrance to the liquor store.

"Give me a bottle of whisky," she said. She got a good-sized one and paid $1 50 for it and hastened home. She had formulated a plan. She would try it. She took a seat near a window where she could see her husband as he returned.

About 6 o'clock she saw him coming, and as usual, the sidewalk was none too wide for him. She hastily upset the soup tureen on the tablecloth, turned over the coffee pot, scattered potatoes, bread and meat over the table, knocked a couple of pieces of crockery together. They broke into a dozen pieces, which she dropped on the table and floor. She took the pins from her long hair and it fell half way to her waist. She tumbled it up with her hands; then upset two or three chairs, pulled the cork from the bottle of whisky and filled her mouth half full of the contents of the bottle. Perhaps a few drops went down her throat. It was so strong that it burned her mouth. She rubbed it over her face, spilt it over her dress front and on the carpet, and filled a glass half full. As she heard his unsteady step on the piazza she didn't fall down, but she hastily laid down on the floor beside a fallen chair, the whisky bottle clutched in her hand, and assumed, or tried to, an appearance of drunken stupor.

The door opened and Sy entered. He saw the room in disorder, the dinner upset, chairs turned over, crockery broken and his wife drunk on the floor with a whisky bottle in her hand, her long hair wet and tangled about her face. The sight fairly sobered him. "Nora! my Nora! Good God! has it come to this?" And he raised her in his arms and laid her on a sofa, and, drunk as she was, or rather as he supposed she was, showered kisses upon her lips.

"Nora! Darling! Wife!"

No answer. She seemed limp as a rag. "My God! Dead drunk!" said he. Nora was careful to keep her eyes closed, but groaned and ground her teeth, and he heard her mutter the words: "Sy, my Sy, for better or worse. We'll get drunk together, dear."

Sy removed the broken crockery and whisky and hastened three doors away for old Dr. Tracy. The doctor came in a hurry. Perhaps he was expecting the call, and perhaps he had counseled the experiment. He examined his patient.

"Why, she's dead drunk," he said. "Does she often get that way?"

"No; never. My wife drunk!"

"Where did she get the whisky?" asked the doctor.

"I carried the bottle out," was Sy's answer.

"Get it," said the doctor. "I must see what quantity she drank."

Sy went to the kitchen for the bottle, and while he was gone Nora's eyes actually opened, and she winked at Dr. Tracy when Sy brought in the bottle. "Just as I expected," said the doctor; "from the family liquor store. That place is ruining some of the best men and women of the town, and your wife has taken a large quantity. Her very life is in danger. Did you get her the whisky?"

"I did not," replied Sy.

"So much the worse. It shows that she must have gone for it herself and deliberately got drunk, and perhaps with suicidal intent. She may be tired of life. I may be able to save her this time, but it will be weeks before she gets over it. These women are weaker than men. Under no account must she ever be permitted to even smell whisky again. It would only bring back that terrible appetite, which a weak woman cannot resist. Of course it's different with men. A man can stop. It won't be safe for you to leave her a moment, night or day, for a week or two; and if you love your wife, never let her smell whisky, even on your breath."

"Love my wife! My God! I'd die for her."

"Better yet, live for her and make her happy. I will leave you these powders. There are six of them. She must have one every two hours, when awake. Here are some for you. You will probably need them to compose your nerves. Take one now, and another when you feel in need of it. I will send my wife's sister over to watch to-night; and you need have no fear; I shall not tell her that your wife is drunk. I will call at 7 o'clock in the morning."

The doctor left, and the tears were running down Sy's cheeks as he got his poor drunken wife to bed. "My wife, my Nora, drunk, and I the cause."

"Poor little dear. Smell whisky again? No, you shall never smell it from my breath." Twice in the night Nora partially awoke, but seemed dazed. However, they got her to take the powders. When Sy awoke in the morning she was sitting up in bed. She grasped hold of his hand.

"Oh, Sy, dear, please get me the whisky from the other room. It's from the store. We'll get drunk together, dear. Please do, Sy."

"No deary; here's this powder instead." Sy didn't leave the house for three weeks. He has never taken a drink since, and twenty-three years have intervened. The young lawyer is now judge of the district court. Other children have blessed their home. But not for the world would Sy allow the smell of whisky to pervade his house. His wife wouldn't be safe; for women are weaker than men, you know.

All Women Can Fool Men.

He ought to credit a woman for her cleverness and give her three or four extra kisses because she could fool him; and say Hm with a capital H and the other two letters the next size. There has never been a woman yet who couldn't fool a man. He may have written the Declaration of Independence; he may have made the McKinley bill; he may be able to tell them whether things are all wool or not; he may be sufficiently nervous to climb over ten women when he goes out to get a drink; but a small, innocent, ignorant-looking little girl can prove to him that black is a lovely shade of white, and that, though some people may flatter him and tell him he is a great man, she don't say it in so many words, because she knows it so thoroughly—Bab.

Not a Clerical Accomplishment.

Burnaud, the editor of London Punch, occasionally refers, with an appearance of regret, to the loss of his bishopric. Not that he ever occupied that rank in the church, but he is convinced that he would have been a prelate—possibly even a cardinal—by now if he had stuck to the ecclesiastical profession. It was ventriloquism which led to his abandonment of the priesthood, to which he had been destined and for which he had been trained from his earliest boyhood. Addicted to practical jokes and possessed of a fund of humor, which is so delightful to the readers of Punch, he devoted his efforts while an inmate of the seminary of Our Lady of the Angels, at Bayswater, not to mastering theology, but to harassing the venerable rector of the institution. The life of the latter was rendered a perfect burden to him by Burnaud's pranks and jokes. These were frequently of a ventriloquial character and were mostly played in chapel; indeed, the solemnity of the surroundings seemed invariably to have the effect of calling into activity all his fun and devilry, and both matins and vespers were disorganized by the extraordinary voices and extravagant remarks which the young ventriloquist caused to proceed from bodies both animate and inanimate in the sacred edifice. Words of the most terrible heresy, intermingled with fiendish chuckles, would seem to issue from the pulpit when occupied by the rector; and the old gentleman, at the conclusion of his sermon, would be in the act of resuming his seat, when suddenly a volley of protesting mews and angry spitting would cause him to leap almost clear into the air with the conviction that he had sat plump down on the monastic cat. Finally the rector was unable to stand it any longer and declined to permit Burnaud to remain an inmate of the seminary, recommending him at the same time to abandon a vocation for which he did not appear to be suited. The young seminarist took the advice to heart, and instead of applying himself to preparation of his countrymen for a future existence, has devoted his energies to more or less successful efforts to cheer and brighten their life here on earth.—Harper's Magazine.

A Student's Stratagem.

The landlady of a certain medical student, who ineffectually dunned her delinquent tenant for some time, resolved at last upon resorting to extreme measures. She entered the student's room one morning and said in a decided tone:

"You must either pay me my rent or be off this very day!"

"I prefer to be off," said the student, who on his side was prepared for the encounter.

"Well, then, sir, pack up directly."

"I assure you, madam, I will go with the utmost expedition if you will assist me a little."

"With the greatest pleasure."

The student thereupon went to a wardrobe, tranquilly opened a drawer and took out a skeleton, which he handed to the dame.

"Will you have the kindness to place this at the bottom of my trunk?" (folding it up).

"What is that?" asked the landlady, recoiling a little.

"That?"

"Yes, that."

"Pooh! that? Oh, it is the skeleton of my first landlord. He was inconvenient enough to claim the rent of three terms that I owed him, and then—Be careful not to break it; it is Number One of my collection."

"Monsieur!" exclaimed the dame, growing visibly paler.

The student, without replying, opened a second drawer and took out another skeleton.

"This—this is my landlady in the Rue de l'Ecole de Medecin; a very worthy woman, but who also demanded the rent of two terms. Will you place it upon the other? It is Number Two."

The landlady opened her two eyes as large as porte-cochères.

"This," continued the student—"this is Number Three. They are all here. A very honest man, and whom I did not pay, either. Let us pass on to Number Four."

But the landlady was no longer there. She had fled, almost frightened to death.

From that day no more was ever said about the rent.

"Dotty" is used in England as a synonym for crazy, while 'bosky' signifies tipsy. 'You must be bosky or dotty' is, therefore, the modern English, or, at any rate, Londonese for 'You must be drunk or crazy.' 'Oh, I say!' with a rising inflection, in an exclamation of astonishment combined with unbelief. It is an equivalent of the elegant 'What are you giving us?' of this country."

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1891.

No. 37.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Prosperity is staring the funded-debt commission in the face.

And the Bee. Have we misunderstood the language in its former expressions? Why the change?

"THEMIS gets laughed at; Judge H. O. Beatty shows that Major Anderson's figures are wrong," is a startling head-line to one of the many communications Judge Beatty seems called upon to write for our daily contemporaries. It was written in olden time: "To everything is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven. * * * A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance." We are not disposed to dispute a time has come when Judge Beatty can reasonably afford to laugh; that the triumverate Myer, Davis and Bates can join heartily in the chorus. We are not, however, aware any of the taxpayers of Sacramento are laughing; that they are dancing and are liable to dance unless they will realize there will be a time to kick, is manifest. In the News of October 20th Judge Beatty laughingly announces that, "This year, from January, 1891, to January, 1892, the receipts of the sinking and interest fund will be about $145,000. * * * Next year the income of the sinking and interest fund will be considerably increased. It will probably be from $150,000 to $155,000." This latter dose, it is presumed, will be administered to this good people in equal annual portion for five successive years. The Judge doubtless desires that they may have a grand opportunity to dance and be laughed at for their folly. We are gratified the editor of the News, whose paper has a large circulation among the thinking workers, is coming to see this thing as do the people and the editors of THEMIS. In a short sentence in an editorial article published on the 24th, he said, pertinently: "The other bonds, the 1903 indebtedness, could be safely allowed to go until they are due before trying to pay them. It would be a good thing to take up these bonds if we had the cash, but there is no use over taxing the people to redeem bonds before the date of their maturity." Judge Beatty, in an article in the News of October 27th, says: "THEMIS thinks excessive taxation ought to be avoided. So do I. In this we agree." There is a very simple way to prevent this taxation, that will be manifestly excessive—cut down the revenues. The drain proposed to be exacted from this people for the coming six years will be oppressive—unconscionable. It will be the burden will fall largely upon the poor. Many there are among us who can ill afford to stand the extortionate water-rates. Think of it! one dollar per month for a family, and the city presumptively owning the works! So long as, under the present system, there remains not enough of their income to maintain these works, and the deficiency has to be made up by the transferment of moneys from other funds, why keep up these exorbitant rates? Let the trustees amend the ordinance and cut the water-rates down one-half at least.

It was stated in one of our daily contemporaries, and we do not know now which one, that it was a matter of pride with Judge Beatty to pay off this thirty-year-old debt within the next six years; to saddle it upon those who now live here and who may happen along within that time. Ambition we respect; we respect, also, our pockets. We suggest Judge Beatty should have some influence over his son-in-law, Bates, formerly the paid attorney of the city in this very litigation. In his writing of October 27th the Judge does admit Bates has bonds, but the inference is given out that Bates believes the credit of the city is so good that he will not sell them at the price the commission is willing to pay for them. Would it not be a graceful act for Bates to compliment his father-in-law by permitting his former client to purchase the bonds he has at the price he paid, or contracted to pay, for them? From the statement of the Judge, Bates is holding out for the last dollar; he wants a delay. We are willing to meet Bates a full half way; we want to wait.

Semper idem—though we are now laughed at by a quartet (Myer, Davis, Bates and Beatty), it will come the steadfast policy of THEMIS will be popularly respected: to protect the people and shield them, so far as possible, from oppressive taxation. We esteem it those upon whom the burden is intended to be cast will appreciate the fight we have made and that we will make.

Among the many gross errors into which Judge Beatty suffers himself to be led by the extraordinary greed which seems to have possessed him, of crowning his own venerable head with all the laurel leaves, and all the honors due for services to the city in its struggle with its creditors, is one that should not pass unnoticed and without rebuke. In one of his recent self-laudations—a couple of columns of that kind of performance—he says (the italics are ours):

In 1887 Samuel Davis commenced suit to recover interest on coupons of 1876-7. Mr. Catlin was defending this suit, and I believed would be able to defeat the claim on technical grounds. But such a judgment would not be a finality; the question would still come up in other forms of action and proceedings, and lead to almost endless litigation. I suggested to Mr. Catlin that by the terms of the contract between the city and its creditors neither the bonds nor coupons could bear interest after maturity. This was a point that had never been thought of or suggested by any attorney in those cases. Mr. Catlin allowed me to file a brief before Judge Hunt. My point was sustained. The result is the saving of about a half a million of dollars to the city in interest on coupons and past-due bonds.

Now, the truth is: Instead of the point never having been thought of or suggested before this imaginary discovery of it in May, 1888, when Judge Beatty's brief was filed before Judge Hunt, it was made more than three years before by the attorneys for the city, and was decided in favor of the city, in the case of Davis vs. Porter, by the Supreme Court in bank (all the judges concurring), on April 27th, 1885, and reported in 66 Cal. 658. "My point" was then the only point urged by Mr. Catlin in behalf of the city, and it was well supported by authorities. Indeed, it was not new even then, for it had been decided the same way twice before by our old Supreme Court as early as 1870, in the cases of Soher vs. Supervisors of Calaveras Co., 39 Cal. 134, and Beals vs. Supervisors of Amador Co., 28 Cal. 449; both of which cases were cited in behalf of the city, as well as being cited by the Court in support of its opinion. The Court, in the opening sentence of its opinion, said:

Only one question is before us for decision in this case, viz: Is the petitioner entitled to have the writ of mandate ordered by this court commanding the treasurer of the city of Sacramento to pay interest on the interest due on the coupons which were not paid at maturity?

Judge Beatty must have forgotten all about that case; or perhaps he never heard of it. We have not seen his brief which he was allowed to file before Judge Hunt, and therefore cannot deny that he claimed "my point" as his own original conception; but we think it a safe proposition to say that if he did not call the attention of Judge Hunt to the fact that the question had been directly decided by the Supreme Court in bank in a case between the city and the same creditor, then his brief could have been of but little use to the court. On January 16th, 1890, the Supreme Court decided the case of Bates vs. Gerber (82 Cal. 550), in which it said:

The precise question presented here was decided adversely to the appellant in Davis vs. Porter, 66 Cal. 658. On the authority of that case the judgment of the court below must be affirmed; not alone because it has been so decided by this court, but because it was correctly decided, for the reasons stated in the opinion.

Perhaps no statement in relation to the history of the bonded debt wider from the truth than this made by Judge Beatty could be made. There are some others, however, creations of his own eccentric imagination, which are as wide—notably, the one that the city attempted to repudiate the debt, and in so doing lost a million of dollars, and that "now she has that million to pay again."

The taxpayers of Sacramento ought to split their sides with laughter at the humor of the head of the funded debt commission. It is very humorous to know that this clever "financier" has benefited the people so much by causing the taxpayers to pay nearly one million and half dollars in cash for an obligation originally valued at less than one-third of that amount, and still leaving a mortgage on the city of considerably over a million dollars. It must be exceedingly amusing to learn that this system of financiering has taken the money that should have gone for local improvement, and given it, without an adequate consideration, to those who have no interest in Sacramento, save the "interest fund," which has been so jealously guarded by this immaculate "financier." It is also very funny to think of the destruction of our water-works, in order to squeeze out a little more money for the cormorants. It is also decidedly mirthful to hear those people prate about this city being insolvent: By this most "beneficial" system of finance the bonds of this municipality are at par. The funded debt commission has labored for nearly twenty years to make twenty cents' worth one dollar, and has accomplished that end. Of course the taxpayers should feel elated and explode with spontaneous humor at this master stroke of finance. Many of our business men who have labored years to build up their business should be transfixed by mirth at the great increase of license taxes to meet the demands of these humorous gentlemen.

The great desire to increase the interest and sinking fund makes it quite evident that the trustees were induced to levy the heavy additional tax on saloon men through the agency of the bond creditors, and that the pretext of regulating disreputable places was used to that end. No wonder the "great financiers" of this city boast of their ability to pay the debt in six years, when the bulk of the water rents are taken, and $25,000 a year additional exacted from one branch of legitimate business. It would seem to a reasonable person that genuine prosperity would flow rather from low taxes, low water rates, and low licences. Our financiers rather believe in piling on the burdens.

We said that under the present rate of taxation, which includes the 55 per cent. of the gross water rates, and the high liquor licenses, that the debt might be paid in six years—but at the cost of the water-works. We said that $1,500,000 had been paid out of the treasury and that the debt is now three times as great as it was when the funding scheme was inaugurated. This is true. We admitted that there is now no remedy so long as the city is dominated by the bondholders. What we claim is, that this ruinous taxation should be reduced; that the water-works should be relieved and preserved; that 55 per cent. of the net revenue only should be allowed the bondholders; that there should be nothing done to increase the value of the debt; that it is the policy of the city government to depreciate the value of the debt; that care should be taken that nothing be done to increase the interest and sinking fund so as to give life to barred bonds. We are paying interest on the bonds held by the commission, just the same as those of the outsiders, and to that end it is practically the same as though we paid it directly to the outsiders, there being only a small discount of say 5 or 6 per cent. For five years the bondholders have been draining the life out of the water-works, and this virtually at the instance of the commissioners, who are partly benefited by having larger returns for their coupons. It is this undue exaction we call attention to. When 55 per cent. of nearly all our gross revenue is taken, as a matter of course the debt can be paid in six years. We suggested that perhaps it might be in full accord with the ideas of the funded-debt commission to make one levy and pay off the debt at once. Our neighbor the Bee has fallen in with the scheme, and has forgotten that this extortion, particularly of the water rents, means the destruction of the water-works, which in time means half a million dollars. No, friend McClatchy, we are not in error—save, possibly, in the amount of bonds due in 1888, held by the commission. What we said and claim is, that there is too great a drain for revenue for the bondholders. There is no necessity for this, and it is the duty of the authorities to stop that upon the water-works. We say that there is too much interest evinced in behalf of the poor bondholders and too little for the people. We said that if there had never been any such thing as the funded-debt commission this city would have been the richer by $1,500,000. This is true. It was through this agency alone that the debt, which in 1872 was worth not to exceed $450,000, entailed the monster incubus that has held us in its grasp ever since. No matter how the figures are now contorted, that fact still remains. All the sophistries of the debt commission cannot wipe out this truth.

The bondholders and the funded debt commission can afford to laugh at the taxpayers, now that they have secured an enormous flow of gold into the treasury for their benefit; and they and their new-found allies of the press can assume a virtue they have not, by saying "this cannot be helped now."

Never mind our streets. Do not consider any public improvement. Continue to do the public business in an old rickety barn. Have our municipal offices and court in some rented place, but pile up the revenue for the bondholders and their allies the funded debt commission. This is the proper thing, so say our local press, in order to pay dollar for dollar on an infamous obligation.

After invoking every power and means possible to swell the interest and sinking fund, the "financiers" and their allies now proclaim there is no way to decrease the enormous revenue exacted from the people. THEMIS has for nearly three years, and its editors for eleven years have, continuously pointed out the injustice of increasing the bondholders' fund, as well as the debt commissioners' fund. We have always during that period contended against all additional revenue. We say again, that the city authorities should at once apply only 55 per cent. of the water rents, after all the expenses of operating the works have been deducted. This would not only protect the works, but would enable our citizens to have reduced water rates. We opposed the high license, to reduce revenue. Here, then, are two ways to reduce the bondholders' revenue and to relieve our tax-ridden people. Again: If there is any disposition to act on behalf of the taxpayers, the assessment roll could be reduced, and thus cut off much revenue from the bondholders. But in doing these things this immaculate funding scheme would be also curtailed; and, of course, that would never do. What are the people's interests compared with this high and mighty scheme? It must be a great thing to force money enough out of our people to pay dollar for dollar on this damnable and iniquitous debt. The "friends" of the city are too happy in the consciousness of having increased the debt to par rather than to have it remain what it would have been, comparatively worthless and uncollectable. Of such are the alleged "friends" of the city.

The town of Great Barrington, which has been brought into considerable notoriety of late by reason of the Hopkin's castle construction and, more recently, the Hopkins-Searles will contest, has long since given title to a lengthy "history"—a volume prepared by Charles J. Taylor, who is a native of the town and a wealthy merchant. By reference to the map it will be seen that it is situated in the southwestern corner of the state of Massachusetts, separated from New York on the west and from Connecticut on the south by only one intervening village. The village proper—for there are three villages in the town: Great Barrington, Van Deusenville and Housatonicville—is beautifully situated on the banks of the Housatonic river, that winding stream dividing the settlement. On the east a spur of the Green mountains rises to an eminence of three or four hundred feet, while on the west of the village—bordering the narrow valley of not over half a mile in width at this point—is a low range of hills, not more than forty or fifty feet above the level of the main street. To the west of this range, but within the town limits, runs the "river with waters of green," of whose beauties Bryant so charmingly sang. The town is named after Lord Barrington, the claim is put forward; and it is set forth on a monumental shaft, that in this village, in a court-house which stood on a lot afterwards occupied by the boarding school-house kept by Mrs. Hopkins-Searles' aunts in part and in part owned and occupied by the residences of judges Whiting and Sumner, there was made the first resistance to British tyranny in this country—when the English judges sent there to hold court were driven from the bench. As already intimated, William Cullen Bryant once resided in Great Barrington; and here he married his wife—a Miss Fairchild—"O fairest of the rural maids." The house in which he was married is still standing, and the room in which he was married is visited by hundreds of curious visitors during the summer season. Through Great Barrington passed General Burgoyne and his army after the surrender at Saratoga; and in the old gable-roofed house in which the poet Bryant resided, Burgoyne lay sick for several days. The ruts of the old Burgoyne road are still decipherable on the adjacent hill and mountain sides. Of this village Henry Ward Beecher remarked that he never visited it without wishing that he might always reside there. Within the past forty years it has been largely "occupied" by wealthy persons who do business in the great city of New York.

"And dotting all the valley's plain
Are mansions of the proud
Who leave the city's strife for gain
In summer's sultry cloud,
In quiet haunts like these to find
From care a sweet release,
And gather for a burdened mind
The recompense of peace."

Monument mountain towers in the northern part of the town, of whose glories Bryant also sang, and beneath whose shadows G. P. R. James wrote several of his most attractive novels. There is said to be a large representation of the natives of Great Barrington in this state, and many of our people have spent one or more seasons in the town. Of the former may be mentioned John M. Cushing and Henry Gibson, of Oakland; Hiram Burchadt, of Sacramento; Chas. A. Sumner, S. H. and L. K. Baldwin, of Santa Cruz. The late Judge Niles was at one time principal of the academy in Great Barrington and studied law there in the office of Increase Sumner. D. M. Delmas sojourned there for some time in his student years. Park Benjamin, C. Edwards Lester, the author-preacher Headley and Prof. John Bascom have resided in the village.

A superstition of the Roskolniki was, that the divine image resided in the beard. Emperor William, of Germany, has created quite a sensation among his people by cutting off his beard. This is said to have been done at the wish of his wife, which gives rise to the idea that if the Emperor is thus caused to forego his beard at the instance of a woman, he might be influenced through the same agency on more important matters of state. The human beard, from the earliest history of mankind, has been a subject of veneration, superstition and the edicts of kings and rulers. With the Jews and Orientals the beard was a sacred and cherished thing. Israel came out of Egypt, where beards were never worn, with their beards as the outward and visible sign of true men. It was an insult to rudely touch the beard. Israel swore by the beard, and a violation of this oath was infamy. It was through the touching of the beard that the signal of distress was made. The followers of Islam deemed the beard a help to salvation. The hairs that came from this appendage were preserved and burned with religious rites. In Asia, wars have occurred on grievances connected with shaving. Tartars and Persians and Chinese and Tartars have frequently had serious troubles on the question of the hirsute adornments. In the sixteenth century Selim I, of Turkey, ignored the ancient sacredness of the beard, which was a violent shock to the faithful Mahometans. The absolute power of the sultan did not permit his subjects to remonstrate, and it was through one of the high priests that a remonstrance was made to Selim, who put aside the appeal with a joke. "I have cut off my beard," said he, "in order that my vizier may have nothing to lead me by." Still, with all this, the Mahometan makes the beard a part of his religion. The Princes of Nineveh go abroad with their beards curled and oiled. While the Egyptians wore no beards, on great festal occasions they wore false beards to assert their dignity, and all their male deities were represented with beards.

The Greeks and Romans were antagonistic to beards, and the Emperor Julian wrote a book denouncing beards. On one occasion a young ambassador, who was minus a beard, was sent on important matters of state to a neighboring king, who expressed his wrath at having a beardless youth sent him as an envoy. "If," said the latter, "my master had thought you would laid so much account on a beard, he would have sent you a goat." Alexander the Great abolished the beards of his soldiers for the reason that they furnished handles to their enemies whereby to lay hold of them. The Macedonians did not take kindly to this order because they had veneration for their beards. The beard is more general in Germany than any other European country, and affords the example of the longest beards known. The removal of Emperor William's beard will, as a matter of course, set the fashion for the nation, and the result will be something of a shock to the old fellows who look upon the beard as sacred. In Russia at the present time beards are prized highly, and emblematic of a high place in the social scale. Under Peter the Great a tax was levied on beards. Noble chins were assessed at a rouble, the common at a copeck. When the tax was not paid there was compulsory shaving. Philip V, of Spain, was unable to cultivate a beard, and through this infirmity set the fashion which caused the dons to clip theirs off, who gave expression to their feelings: "Since we have lost our beards, we have lost our souls." It was evident that prior to Philips' time beards were held in great reverence in Spain.

When the Portugese admiral, Juan de Castro, borrowed a thousand pistoles from the city of Goa, he gave in pledge one of his whiskers, saying: "All the gold in the world cannot equal this natural ornament of my valour." If such security was taken in those days, we know of some people in this city who might obtain pretty large sums of money for a poor quality of whiskers, if their owner should be taken into account. In France the question of beards was one of fashion alone. Francis I, having wounded his chin concealing the scar by allowing his beard to grow. Immediately all loyal chins had scars to conceal. It was one of the customs of a former French king to place three hairs from his beard under the waxen seal, which gave the document greater security. The fashion gives names to different styles of beard, such as "royal," "imperial," "goatee," "burnside," and many other names. On the subject of shaving, Talleyrand once drew a fine distinction. He was asked if Napoleon shaved himself. "Yes," replied Talleyrand; "one born to be a king has some one to shave him; but they who acquire kingdoms shave themselves." During the reign of Henry VIII, among the lawyers, the authorities of Lincoln's Inn prohibited the wearers of beards from sitting at the great table, unless they paid double commons.

"Now of beards there be such a company,
Of fashions such a throng,
That 'tis very hard to treat of the beard,
Tho' it be never so long."

When we see ladies making their shopping and calling tours in carriages, we reflect that while the custom is in some respects good, it is in other respects a part of an unfortunate system. Ladies are handed along through the busy world in such a way as to fail of that observation which is best fitted to impart a substantial, common-sense tone of mind. Those who instruct young ladies in natural philosophy and chemistry find that their pupils have not had opportunity to notice the most common machines and business processes. The familiar illustrations which a young man will understand instantly are "heathen Greek" to a young miss. She is trundled in a close carriage, handed out and hurried into the steamboat or car, or hotel or shop, as if the very sight of a crowd of men would contaminate, and she has no chance to see the every-day realities on which the world depends. She cannot stop to look at the locomotive, the cars, the switches, or the cranes at the railroad station. She cannot observe the grand operations of building, printing, and manufacturing in the city. Carried along like the canary in its cage, she is not expected to see the doings of the great world, except in a very limited lady sphere; she may notice the fashions and the fancies, but not the solid realities. Do the ladies feel that this is doing honor to their abilities? Talk not of delicacy—such a false life is often passed amid the most skillful arts of contamination; and there is no womanly sense, acquired in the real world, to withstand them. Let the young miss be trusted to know something of that which occupies the manly energies of father and brother, and the influence will be elevating and salutary. She will learn that life is real, life is earnest. We have seen many a young lady who had traveled much by railroad, who had no idea of the manner in which the water is introduced into the boiler of the locomotive. We have seen young ladies completely puzzled over a cut in their class book, figuring the pulley or windlass, or screw press, which a boy of ten years would understand in an instant. We have heard the instructor in chemistry refer to the steaming lime-trough, which is seen wherever a mortar-bed is made for a new building, to illustrate the evolution of latent heat, and the young ladies have been found utterly destitute of acquaintance with this every-day phenomenon. It is astonishing to observe the extent of this ignorance; and it is sad that ladies should thus be cheated out of life's opportunities for practical instruction. If you would have your daughter or sister a woman of mental scope and refinement, count her worthy to see something of the business world. Take her to the locomotive, that proud triumph of manly skill and strength, and explain to her its working. Take her to the steam printing press; to the unloading ship; to the warehouse. Tell her to account herself able and worthy to know the great movements of the real world. Cultivate a taste for such observation, and the taste for worthy reading will follow. The young lady who comprehends the plan of the steam engine, will be interested in the life of Watt. If she has studied the operations of the printing press, she will inquire after its history. A mind that has come to apprehend in what a world of wonderful realities we are living will deem it hardly worth while to spend many of life's few days over the fabrications of the novelist. The effect will also be seen in conversation. Earnest topics will be chosen instead of heartless common-places and shallow wit.

Editor Loos, of the Sisson Mascot, is quite facetious in his account of the visit recently made to his town by the California Press Association, the members of which he describes as "a job lot of homely, ill-shapen, plaid-whiskered, jerky writers, whose personal appearance averaged but little better than the Mascot nightmare." His glowing compliment to the "beauty, grace and wit of the charming ladies, who gave tone and polish to the excursion," makes ample apology to the gentlemen of the party for his rather severe strictures on their personal charms and conclusively proves that Sisson's Adonis like editor has an eye single for the beautiful.

Last year we had an Indian Messiah, who created pretty general confusion in the Indian country by his extravagant notions of religion. Now we have another Messiah, who has gone from Chicago to Pittsburg, Pa., and who is named Teed. This latter Messiah is a kind of business fellow and proposes to build six-track railroads across the continent, and cutting a fifty-mile pathway through the Rocky mountains. This new Redeemer does not seem to be of the orthodox model, but is a store-keeping, railroad-building, mountain-moving fellow. We await the marvelous acts of this second Messiah.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

In the game of life the opera composer makes the most scores.

A play is like a stream, in that when it is stopped it is said to be damned.

When the curtain of a theater takes a drop the majority of the males in the audience go out to follow suit.

The man who "cannot sing the old songs" and won't try is the one we like to meet at an evening party.

Mrs. Bernard Beere, who is unquestionably the most popular society actress in London, is making her plans to visit this country next year. We are curious to see what kind of an impression she makes here. She is neither handsome nor pretty.

Among the most charming songs of the period is Stephen C. Massett's graceful melody, "My Darling's Face." Steve Massett is well known by all the "old tin ers." It seems that "Jeems Pipes, of Pipesville," will never grow old. He was often a guest of the old Bohemian club of this city.

It is authoritatively announced that Mr. Henry Irving and his company will revisit this country in 1893. The repertory will then be enlarged by three pretentious dramas, viz.: Macbeth, Ravenswood, and Henry VIII. Quite recently Mr. Irving has been reviving The Bells, Olivia, and The Lyons Mail, with prodigious success.

Stuart Robson's first appearance on any stage is said to have been made in Baltimore, with Edwin Booth, John Sleeper Clarke, and Theodore Hamilton, in the cellar of Mrs. Hamilton's house. These aspiring lads, whose ambitions were so well rewarded in after life on the real stage, built in the cellar a stage on which they produced an equine drama of their own composition. The horse was purchased by them in the horse market for $3 75, and on refusing to be either led or driven down the stairs, was taken mournfully back to market and resold for $2 50. But the play went on, and the actors have gone on in maturer years.

The German playwright Paul Lindeau adopted the following novel way of getting even with his wife who got her virtue a little mixed: "Lindeau was a prolific German playwright. Discovering that his beautiful wife had slipped from the primrose path, he wrote a play in which she and her lover were so minutely portrayed that they saw through it how the wronged husband took an unusual measure to revenge himself. This powerful stroke so shamed his wife that she slipped away from Berlin with her lover, much to the joy of Lindeau, who didn't want to be bored with the humiliation of a public divorce in the courts."

Mascagni is the youthful composer whose genius burst into a rosy bloom in the June of his manhood. He is but 26 years old, and the world is looking to him for more striking works, the equal of his French, English, and American success, The Rustic Cavalier. Specialists have discovered in this one-act opera the mingled tumult and melody of Wagner, Verdi, and Bizet, and the work, mind you, is an airy, graceful, picturesque thing in conduct. Bellini was 27 years old when he gave to the world Norma and La Sonnambula. Georges Bizet wrote Carmen at 26, and Mozart copied the Miserere at the Sistene Chapel at the age of 14, and died at the age of 36. Mascagni has followed the rule of this glorious triumvirate in regard to youthful fame.

Novels constitute nine-tenths of the reading in the world.

The author who is seriously depressed by unfavorable notices of his work may be said to be critically ill.

"I have never read Shakespeare's works," said a pretentious woman; "but I always entertained the highest opinion of him as a man."

Walter Jerrold, a grandson of the humorist, has written a new "Life of Faraday," containing much original and authentic information about the great scientific man.

But, after all, the newest authors are the oldest. In this new edition ("Familiar Quotations") we have a lot of familiar sayings traced away back to Greece and Egypt.

A Virginian has written a book to prove that the negro cannot enter heaven as the equal of the white man. His opinion will be read with interest by the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The whole universe seems to be permeated with Americanism. Dr. Higgings, of London, a famous English astronomer, says the stars are red, white and blue, according to their age. The white stars are the youngest.

The baroness von Ebner-Eschenboch, the foremost woman novelist in Austria, and since the time of Baroness Tautphoeus the ablest of the female writers of German fiction, is devoted to the watch-maker's art, and her practical knowledge of the subject is so great that she is sometimes called upon to repair the antique time-pieces of her friends. She possesses a notable collection of watches, gathered through years of search.

Paul Du Chaillu, the noted traveler and African explorer, is a little brown man with flashing black eyes, smooth brown face, and a head as bald as a baby's. He is a confirmed old bachelor, but has manners that charm women. It is rather remarkable that the majority of the men who have found fame in the dark continent are men of small physique. Livingstone, Emin Pasha and Speke were little fellows physically, and Stanley is hardly cast in a heroic mould.

It is understood that the romantic incidents in the life of Jane Hading, the beautiful emotional actress of Paris, have been adopted by Mr. Hobart C. Taylor for the basis of a novel upon which he is now engaged. Mr. Taylor first met Mme. Hading while she was starring with M. Coquelin in this country, and he was the first American critic, as we recollect, to call attention to the circumstance that the famous beauty invariably wore slippers and hose to match the color of her eyes.

A lawyer generally feels himself competent to break any will except his wife's.

The doctors of medicine are charged with quarreling more than doctors of any other kind; but this is a mistake. All doctors quarrel, but doctors of divinity are responsible for more of the quarreling in the last 1,200 years than all the rest of them put together.

One of the parishioners of a clergyman who is given to preaching safe and sonorous platitudes was recently asked by a friend how his pastor was doing. "Well," he cautiously replied, "he was never known to convert a sinner, but he has a positive genius for edifying the saints."

Othman, third caliph of Bagdad, A. D. 644, was the first to introduce the time-worn formula, "Unaccustomed as I am to public speaking;" at least so we are informed by no less an authority than Sir William Muir, in his "History of the Rise and Fall of the Caliphate."

In ancient Greece the Council of the Areopagus sat and deliberated in the open air; and now there comes from the Caucasus intelligence of a lawsuit which is being heard under similar conditions. The reason given for this new departure is the great number of the witnesses, of whom there were no fewer than 2,000.

Not long since a devout Hindoo gave a live bull to one of his gods and turned the animal loose. A less-worshipful mortal collared the bull and yoked him in his cart. Thereupon followed a lawsuit. The devout man claimed the bull, but the judge decided that the bull was not his; he had given it to his god; and he implied that the deity had not looked after his property.

Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky, must believe in luck, for it was due to the merest chance that his bones do not lie bleaching on the plains of Texas instead of giving him a rheumatic twinge occasionally in the halls of congress. He fought with Sam Houston at San Jacinto and the Alamo, and once escaped with his life by drawing a white bean when the Mexicans had selected a detail of Texans to be shot.

The products of Alaska every year bring more money than that whole region cost. And yet the country at one time thought that this purchase was a bad speculation for us.

England is morally bound to defend Afghanistan against Russian attacks. Perhaps the knowledge that England stands behind the ameer may deter the czar from making a closer approach to India now.

The population of Greece is increasing faster than that of any other country in Europe at present. If the stock is not much better than the sample that comes to this country, this will not be a vindication of the doctrine of "the survival of the fittest."

Probably most people would be surprised to learn that there is a spot in Africa where women have even limited suffrage, but, under the government of the Cape of Good Hope, which rules several hundred thousand square miles of territory, women have municipal suffrage.

The people of the town of Sisson are very much dissatisfied with the chaotic appearance of their cemetery, and are clamoring for the donation of 10-acre tract and lumber enough to fence it in. The editor of the Mascot promises to supply the stiffs when the cemetery shall have been completed.

The German women who desire to ride en cavalier in tights in the public ways and have been forbidden by the prefect of police, have now appealed to the emperor, knowing his love for displaying his superior judgment. This will prove a more knotty problem for William to solve than that of the dismissal of Bismarck from service.

It is said that we owe the invention of visiting cards to the Chinese, and that even so long ago as the Tong dynasty (618-907) visiting cards were used in China. No nation observes so strictly the ceremonies in regard to the paying of visits as the Chinese do, but the cards they use for this purpose are very different from our dainty bits of white paper, being large enough to fold twice, and of a bright red color.

Clara Louise Kellogg's diamond ring was swallowed the other day by a dog. The singer purchased the animal. John Gruhl-er's favorite dog, "Ben," a number of years ago swallowed a $20-piece. The money belonged to Gus Camp. Now both John and Gus keep a sharp lookout for "Ben." The autopsy on "Ben," when he passes to the canine hereafter, will disclose some interesting facts for medical science, even though it is only a poor dog that is the subject.

No generosity is truly generous, no kindness is really kind, that sets justice at defiance. The damage that injustice commits is a double one, always reacting from the injured to the injurer. To discover the claims of justice, and to perceive where they begin to be infringed, demand a clear mind and discriminating powers; and, therefore, to cultivate these becomes more than an intellectual process and resolves itself into a moral duty.

A French scientist has compiled some interesting statistics to show that a large percentage of the world's most famous men of learning have been clergymen's sons. This deals a blow at the old saw about "ministers' sons," and as for the "deacons' daughters," many of them, like Mrs. Stowe, the Brontës and Mrs. Trollope, have been famous. The misfortune of a minister's son, like that of any son of a distinguished parent, lies in the fact that he is the cynosure of many curious eyes always eager to detect some lapse in him that in another would pass unnoticed.

The Eskimo hunter puts a piece of fat on a sharpened flint and fastens it to a wooden stake planted in the ground. In licking off the fat the wolf cuts his tongue, and, maddened by the taste of the blood, continues to lick the sharp stone. Other wolves, attracted by the smell of blood, now gather around. In their fury they turn upon each other, and the end of the fight is like the historic tragedy of the Kilkenny cats—there are no survivors. All the hunter has to do at this stage is to remove the skins and rebait his trap.

To play a patriot a man must be able to forget himself, to put aside his likes and dislikes and trample them under foot. They were good words that that soldier-jurist, W. Q. Gresham, spoke about Gen. Grant at the unveiling of his monument in Chicago. He said that no success turned his head. He never vaunted his victories or stopped in his work to defend his shortcomings. He left the judgment of his actions to the people. He was devoted to his work and the end that the vast armies he commanded had in view. He commanded himself as well as armies.

In Belgium the system of solitary confinement in prison has been brought almost to perfection by keeping up the constant stimulus of hope in the prisoner. If he has a trade, he works at it; if he wishes to learn a trade, he is taught by a skilled instructor; if he has no special aptitudes for handicraft he is employed in work which can be easily learned in a few lessons. This plan is also followed in the prisons of Switzerland, Germany, Austria and Hungary. The Austrian system is, however, much less humane than the Belgian, in that it leaves a convict's liberation to the mercy of the prison authorities.

It was the dream of a toper that brought about the discovery of the shot-tower process of making shot. Before then, sheets of lead were rolled thin, punched out into little cubes, and these in turn were rolled in a barrel until they became spheroidal. The dreamer's name was Watts, and after spending an evening with boon companions at an ale house, he fell into a heavy sleep. In a vision he saw it begin to rain shot; and, taking refuge in a church tower, he amused himself by looking down at the glittering, lead raindrops as they fell into the moat below. The idea that molten lead so dropped into water would become round occurred to him. The next day he tried it, and the thing was done.

The ecumenical conference of the Methodists in Washington has not been so slow and staid as Washington people expected it would be. The meetings have been enlivened by eloquence, wit and earnest disputation that have made them far from tame. The foreign delegates are particularly spirited. They are all temperance men, but some of them give a very liberal interpretation to the word temperance. It has been quite the usual thing for some of the foreigners to stop in the barroom at their hotel after an adjournment and stand in a group, with their black coats rubbing against the bar and their white ties shining in the face of the mixer of strong drink while they sip their toddy or beer in a matter-of-fact way. Their first appearance at the bar of the hotel where most of them stop completely unnerved the bartender.

The two political parties have made their nominations for school officers. We esteem there will be practically no opposition to the election of Albert Hart to the position of Superintendent. Concerning the nominees for directors we feel no mistake will be made in the selection of any of the men named. In the First Ward Major W. H. Sherburn has been named by the Republicans. He is a man of very positive convictions; has served upon the board, and has a record that is acceptable. Robert Fisher, named by the Democrats in that ward, is well known; a man of education, and in whom we have absolute confidence. In the Second Ward the Republicans have named E. A. Crouch, a young man well and favorably known, and he possesses ample qualification. Against him the Democrats have named Jerry N. Payne, a present member of the board. Nothing can be said against Mr. Payne that we are aware of. In the Fourth Ward the Republicans have renominated O. W. Erlewine, and the Democrats James M. Henderson. Both have lived long in this community. In the Third Ward the Republican nomination fell to an editor of this paper; of him we speak not. The Democrats have nominated John Hantzman, who is in every way qualified for the office both by reason of capacity and the interest we do know he would honestly take in the education of our children. Speaking from his opponent, we do with sincerity congratulate the democratic convention upon their choice, and should the laurel fall to him he may be assured his opponent will extend friendly congratulation. The matter of the election of school officers should not be political; and should there be a suspicion that any candidate will be swayed in his action by any motive save that prompted by conscientious judgment, he should be defeated unquestionably. We do not believe that any man who has been named will fall under the ban.

Let the poor man who has a family reflect that in Sacramento he pays $1.00 a month for water; yet the city owns the works and they are not sustained by the excessive rates. Many there are who sorely feel this excessive draft. Fifty-five cents of that monthly dollar passes into the hands of the bondholders, and Myer, Davis and Bates smilingly rake it in. Reduce the water rates and permit Bates to tarry for the $.

Germany has something a great deal worse than American pork. It is the fact that at least 2,000,000 of her husbands and fathers are working for wages which average less than $150 per year, and wages are going down instead of up.

All Saints Day.

This, the 31st October, is All Hallowe'en, and throughout the country the charms and spells will be observed; and for the benefit of those who would invoke the power of the spirits and witches who prowl about earth doing merry mischief and making a football of Cupid, a few tips are given to lovers. Yonths and maidens in some localities observe this night of nights, and together look for the omens of the future.

Many a luckless youth will try his fortunes by the following medium:

A tub of water is brought in into which three apples are thrown. Down on his knees goes the adventurous youth, his arms tied together behind his back.

Cautiously he bends his head over the water, and as an apple comes sailing toward him he makes a plunge and tries to seize it with his teeth. Nine times out of ten he will miss it, and unless he is very careful will go head-first into the water. A prize is usually offered for the one who secures the greatest number of apples.

With beating heart lovers will sit in pairs by the glowing grate, to-morrow night, and watch their fate in the brown nuts, according to the following:

The glowing nuts are embers true
Of what in human life we view.
The ill matched couple fret and fume
And thus in strife themselves consume;
Or from each other mildly start,
And with a noise forever part.
But see the happy, happy pair,
Of genuine love and truth sincere;
With natural fondness will they burn,
Still to each other kindly turn,
And as the vital sparks decay,
Together gently sink away;
Till life's fierce ordeal being past,
Their mingled ashes rest at last.

Two nuts are thrown into the hot coals by a maiden. She secretly gives a lover's name to each. If one of the nuts bursts, then that lover is unfaithful; but if it burns with a steady glow until it becomes ashes, she knows that her lover's faith is true. Sometimes it happens, but not often, that both nuts will burn steadily, and then is the maiden's heart sore perplexed. A deep bowl filled to the brim with the food is placed in the middle of the table. Somewhere in the bowl is a gold ring, and in the center is a deep well filled with melted butter. Portions are distributed to each person, and the one who finds the ring is certain to be married within a year, unless already married, in which event good luck will follow the finder.

A loaf cake is often made, and in it are placed a ring and a key. The former signifies marriage, the latter a journey; and the finder of either must accept the inevitable.

Fun that never palls is to be had with three saucers, one empty, one containing water, and the third earth. The lassie who is anxious to penetrate the future permits herself to be blindfolded and led to the plates. If she puts her hand into the water she is assured of an early marriage or a pleasant voyage. The empty saucer means an old maid, and the clay an early death.

Apple seeds furnish the title for many chapters of a romance. For instance: Two seeds, early marriage; three, a legacy; four, great wealth; five, a sea voyage; six, great fame as an orator or a singer; seven, the possession of any gift most desired by the finder.

But the mysterious rites of Hallowe'en are not complete when the merry-making is done and "good night" is said. Each young lady, in order to complete the charms of the night, on reaching her home must pluck two roses with long stems, naming one for herself and the other for her lover. She must then go directly to her sleeping-room without speaking to anyone, and kneeling beside her bed must twine together the stems of the two roses and repeat the following lines, gazing meanwhile intently upon the lover's rose:

"Twine, twine and intertwine;
Let my love be wholly mine.
If his heart be kind and true
Deeper grow his rose's hue."

If her swain be faithful the color of the rose will grow darker and more intense.

Real Wisdom.

A Hindoo fable relates that Pandi Cholic, the apothecary, was engaged in transplanting an apple tree from an orchard to the side of the common road, when he was greeted by a learned pundit, who reproached him as being engaged in a useless labor.

"Of what avail is it," asked the pundit, "to plant an apple tree in the hard soil?"

"Of much avail," responded Pandi; "for know, O most learned pundit, that the dreams of an apothecary who dwells in a land of small boys and green apples are sweeter than those of a poet slumbering in the rose garden of Shiraz. The knurlier the apples, the earlier the boys, and, yea, in good time myself to heal them for a consideration. Go to, pundit! thou art too learned to be practical."

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

MISCELLANY.

It is a mistake to suppose that polar research has cost enormously in human life. Despite all the great disasters, ninety-seven out of one hundred explorers have returned alive.

"Won't you be mine?" he cried, as the clock struck 1—"mine forever?" "Are you never satisfied?" she said, impatiently; "this one evening has been long enough, in all conscience."

A Chattanooga dentist lost a valuable diamond ring the other day in a curious manner. He was examining the back teeth of a patient when the ring slipped down the latter's throat.

A girl in Kentucky has recovered $500 damages from a steamboat company for naming a boat after her without asking her permission, and they must rename the boat. She took offense at a marine item stating that "Kittie Marshall took the lower chute and ran her nose into a plantation."

Four different mountain peaks in Idaho are from thirteen to twenty-three feet lower, by actual measurement, than they were fifteen years ago; and it is believed that this settling is going on with many others. The idea is that quicksands have undermined them.

Emma Abbott's ashes are to be surmounted by an $85,000 Gothic monument of westerly granite, which is to be erected in Oak Grove Cemetery, at Gloucester. It will also serve as a tomb for the body of her husband, Eugene Wetherell. The monument will be 57 feet high, and will resemble the Prince Albert memorial at London.

The Indians in North Carolina vote. They have recourse to North Carolina laws save in particular cases where the matters in dispute are between them and the Interior Department. They receive no aid from the State, but do receive it from the National Government. There are about 1,700 of them, and they reside mainly in Jackson and Swain counties.

What does Sacramento need? Not a gilt edging to its credit; Bates is willing to hold on to our securities until we will pay him the last dollar. To his mind they are more solid—brass edged. Let him wait. In the meantime divert as much as possible from the bond fund and avert the calamity of unjust and oppressive taxation, these will retard our progress. We need a public building, pumps at the water-works, and a little more liberality in the education of our children. Let Bates linger.

Family Pride.

The wife of an employé of the Pennsylvania railroad, says the Wilmington (Del.) News, gave a very amusing exhibition of family pride in a dry goods store a few days ago. Her husband is a very tall, thin man; the chest measure of his clothing is very small, and when he buys underclothing he gets the smallest sizes. His wife is a very large woman. She had gone into a store to purchase underclothing for her husband, and while standing at the counter examining the goods a little bit of a woman came in, and, seeing the goods being displayed, said:

"That is what I want; some undershirts for my husband. No. 38, please."

"What number will you have?" said the salesman, addressing the first woman.

"No. 38, please," was the reply.

The two women bought the same size garments, one buying for a big-chested and the other for a narrow-chested man. When the latter took her purchase home and displayed it to her husband he was astonished to find the shirts so big. He said:

"What the — did you buy such big shirts for?"

"Because."

"Well, because what? I can't wear them."

"I don't care. I was not going to stand alongside of a little bit of a woman and buy shirts for a little bit of a man when she was buying shirts for a great big one. If you haven't any pride I have; that's why I bought the big shirts."

One on Dodson.

Mr. Mills, of the S. P. R. Co., got off rather a good one on Dr. Dodson of the Red Bluff Sentinel recently, and he told it right before the ladies, too. According to Mr. Mills, Mr. Dodson was walking along Market street looking into millinery windows, which were replete with new goods. Dodson says, "Well, I'm pleased to see the milliners stocking up." The lady who was with him said, "I don't see what difference it makes to you whether the milliner's stocking is up or down," and she left him.—Sisson Mascot.

A Wheeling journal announced that the people of that town would soon have the pleasure of seeing a certain actor "in his great role of King Lear, in 'Macbeth.'" The paper has, however, since stated that it was misinformed as to the particular role, and interest in the approaching event has abated.

FLASHES.

By wanting too much we enjoy nothing.

The surest thing to drive a man to drink is—thirst.

Some people give a piece of their mind for peace of mind.

It is always proper to forgive our enemies—those we can't whip.

A woman driving is like a cyclone—don't turn out for anything.

The woman that wouldn't marry the best man in the world, never does.

It is worth thousands of dollars a year to be able to look on the bright side of the affairs of life.

Fire and brimstone has no such terror for the ordinary mortal as the anger of a red-headed woman.

Grover Cleveland can be said to have an interest in a third party. The two old parties must yield to the third.

To neglect a farm in ancient Italy was a penal offense. There would be many criminals in this country if we had such a law.

With regard to this matter of the imposition of exorbitant taxation upon this people, it may be understood THEMIS will oppose. Reduce the revenue; let Bates wait till his bonds mature.

What is the use further nursing the iniquitous debt of the past? From almost nothing, it has been given the life of a giant. Quit the nursing, and let the bondholders take care of themselves.

Man Diminishing.

A French statistician who has been studying the military and other records with a view of determining the height of men at different periods, has reached some wonderful results. The recorded facts extend over nearly three centuries. It is found that in 1610 the average height of man in Europe was 1.75 meters, or, say, 5 feet 9 inches. In 1820 it was 5 feet 5 inches and a fraction.

At the present time it is 5 feet 3 3/4 inches. It is easy to deduce from these figures a rate of regular and gradual decline in human stature, and then to apply this working backward and forward to the past and to the future. By this calculation it appears that the stature of the first man attained the surprising average of 16 feet 9 inches. The race had already deteriorated in the days of Og, and Goliath was quite a degenerate offspring of the giants.

Coming down to the latter times, we find that at the beginning of our era the average height of man was 9 feet, and in the time of Charlemagne it was 8 feet 8 inches, a fact quite sufficient to account for the heroic deeds of the paladins.

But the most astonishing result of this scientific study comes from the application of the same inexorable law of diminution to the future. The calculation shows that by the year A. D. 4000 the stature of the average man will be reduced to fifteen inches. And the conclusion of the learned statistician is that "the end of the world will certainly arrive, for the inhabitants will become so small that they will finally disappear"—"finish by disappearing," as the French idiom puts it, "from the terrestrial globe."

For originality, not to say humor, commend us to the answers in examination papers. Here are two or three which an English bishop vouches for: A child was asked to give some account of Oliver Cromwell, and volunteered the information that the Protector "was very unhappy and dreaded assassination. On his deathbed he cried: 'If I had served my God as I served my king, I should not be thus forsaken in my old age!'" Another, evidently with temperance proclivities, defined syntax as "a dooty upon spirits." One smart youth who was asked by an examiner, "Could your father walk around the world?" was equal to the occasion. "No, sir," said he. "Why not?" "Because he's dead."

Sir William Gull once told this anecdote: "As I unfolded the great facts in a physiological lecture concerning the seat of life, the thought grew more and more upon me: 'Upon how thin a thread does life hang!' At length a gloom gathered over my spirit, nor passed away from me in my goings out and comings in. But, while walking in the street one day, feeling very miserable, the heavy cloud was rolled away in a moment by three short words which occurred to me, and which I was surprised I had not thought of before. Life's thread, I felt, was slender, but 'it is enough.' These were my consoling words."

Dr. R. F. Gatling, the inventor of the gun that bears his name, says that he is yet at work inventing, and the habit has so grown upon him that he will keep it up until he dies.

Mrs. J. Sloat Fassett Interviewed.

Our Sacramento girl was called upon by a representative of the New York World, a democratic journal, and the interview was a splendid compliment by that journal. While politically antagonistic to Mr. Fassett's ambitions, the delicate compliments to Mrs. Fassett are well timed and just. We give a few of the sentiments expressed by the little lady, after a brief description by the journalist:

Mrs. J. Sloat Fassett is a very pretty little woman. She is the mother of seven children, five of whom are living, and she has the graceful figure and delicate beauty of a college girl. Her charm is indescribable. But it grows on one. She has the glow, freshness and fragrance of health. Her brown eyes are clear, bright and steady.

There isn't one particle of artifice about her. She has a nice head of dark brown hair, which is worn brushed straight back from the forehead and temples, and coiled at the neck in the simplest manner possible. There isn't a woman in a hundred pretty enough to wear this coiffure. Photographers invariably remonstrate with her. They produce little patches of side curls and "beg madam to allow them," which she emphatically does not. Then they suggest that some crimps or locks be coaxed down over the temple, which is also discouraged, the subject insisting upon being taken just as she is or not at all.

To add to her charm Mrs. Fassett is gentle and very womanly. She has a nice voice; she knows how to keep house; she is devoted to her children; she is in love with her husband, and she has opinions of her own.

Unlike the average American woman, she is a good politician. Her husband's interests are her interests, and the topics, books, papers, business and people that engage his attention arouse her enthusiasm.

Frankness is one of her good points. I was distressed when she told me that she preferred not to talk; and when, later, confidence was established and she wished I "did not represent a democratic paper," my heart collapsed, and my temperature dropped twenty points. But she did not decline to talk, and she did not get icily polite nor frigidly silent. "Since the nomination of my husband," she said, "I have learned some very startling things about myself. Papers come to me from all sections of the country, and in nearly every one I learn something new about myself. One of the Chicago papers said I wrote poetry, painted in oils, and on my wedding day distributed landscapes and figure pieces among the guests."

"And did you?" "Certainly not. I never had a brush in my hand, and couldn't sketch a tree to save my life. When I was at school I wrote a few rhymes, but they were so very bad that my teacher sighed as she dropped them into the waste-basket."

She thinks that the girl of to-day is not quite so lovable as the maiden of twenty years ago. In her girlhood girls were more dependent than they are to-day, and that very dependence seemed to develop the chivalry in man's nature.

I don't like to see our girls forced to go into the business world and struggle with men. It unfits them for home life in a degree, for woman is a delicate plant, and the gain through her endeavor to the preceding generation means a corresponding loss to the next one.

"I believe in early marriage. How we reason from our own experience, don't we? I married at eighteen, and I have been so very happy that I advocate it as the best time for girls to wed. My friends tell me I missed a great deal of fun, but I know that there is much foolish romance and dissipation in what is called belatedness that a woman can forego with profit."

I believe in home life for women, and think there is nothing to compensate for its loss. Home is the place for all human creatures, and the earlier it is built in life the better it will be in structure and the sweeter and stronger in its influence. Take away from life the home and the motive of living is gone.

It has been a rule of my life never to put temptation in the way of youth; that's why I rarely ever ask young people to dinner; and never, under any circumstances, serve punch or wine at a reception, dance or party. We are a temperance family, and ready to lend any influence or help we may have to suppress drunkenness.

Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt usually takes a morning ride with his boys, all of whom are fond and fearless horsemen. Alfred, a lad about 10 years of age, is the crack whip of the family, and rides and drives much and well, especially at Newport. All of the children are fond of music. One plays the banjo, another the violin, and Gertrude, a miss still in her teens, is a favorite pianist.

Encouraging the Horse.

The graceful hint succeeds best. If it is also witty it is pretty sure to prove irresistible. Up one of the long hills of County Wicklow a mare was drawing a heavy load of travelers. The driver walked by her side, trying to encourage her as she toiled slowly and wearily along.

The six passengers were too busily engaged in conversation to notice how slowly the car progressed. Presently the driver opened the door at the rear of the car and slammed it to again. Those inside started, but thought that he was only assuring himself that the door was securely closed.

Again Pat opened and slammed the door. The travelers inquired angrily why he disturbed them in that manner.

"Whist," he whispered, "don't spake so loud—she'll overhear us."

"Who?"

"The mare. Spake low," he continued, putting his hand over his mouth and nose. "Sure, I'm dersavin' the crature! Every time she hears the door slammun' that way she thinks one of yez is gettin' down to walk up the hill and that raises her sperrits."

The passengers took the hint.

Laughed-at THEMIS seems to have stirred up the animals: the dailies are after us; Judge Beatty is thoroughly aroused. Bates will probably come in when the last $ will be in sight.

A Matter of Place.

"Well, madame," says the head of the house, who had apparently got out of bed on the wrong side, "what have you got for breakfast this morning? Boiled eggs, eh? Seems to me you never have anything but boiled eggs. Boiled Erebus! And what else, madame, may I ask?"

"Mutton chops, my dear," says the wife, meekly.

"Mutton chops!" echoes the husband, bursting into a peal of sardonic laughter. "Mutton chops! I could have guessed it! Madame, if I ever eat another meal inside of this house—" and jamming on his hat and slamming the door, the aggrieved man bounds down the stairs and betakes himself to the restaurant.

"What'll you have, sir?" says the waiter, politely handing him a bill-of-fare.

"Ah!" says the guest, having glanced over it. "Let me see—bring me two boiled eggs and a mutton chop."

A Negro's Argument.

An old negro named Pete was very much troubled about his sins. Perceiving him one day with a very downcast look, his master asked him the cause. "Oh! massa, I'm such a great sinner." "But, Pete," said his master, "you are foolish to take it so much to heart. You never see me troubled about my sins." "I know de reason, massa," said Pete. "When you go out duck-shooting, and kill one duck and wound another, don't you run after de wounded duck?" "Yes, Pete;" and the master wondered what was coming next. "Well, massa, dat is de way wid you and me. De debil has got you sure; but, as he am not sure of me, he chases dis chile all de time."

Few men have been greater favorites with the fair sex than the late Prince Napoleon. It is said that King Humbert smiled when the prince first made known his intention to marry Princess Clothilde, who was known as a perfect man-hater and one of the most bashful of women. "Give me only five minutes with her," said the prince, in answer to Humbert's boast that his sister would not listen to his entreaties. The five minutes were granted to the handsome Napoleon, and, true to his word, the prince won the princess within the specified time. Two weeks later the engagement was publicly announced.

Proof Positive.

Mr. Bradley Smyth, in passing under the rear window of his house, receives the contents of a pail of water on his head.

Mrs. Bradley Smyth—Oh, Bradley, dear, I'm so sorry! Believe me, it was an accident; I did not throw it at you.

Mr. Bradley Smyth—I know you did not, dear.

Mrs. Bradley Smyth—How, love?

Mr. Bradley Smyth—Because you hit me.

California Exchange is the name of this beautiful, new resort. Mr. Wahl will be pleased to see all his old friends and others at the grand opening to-night.

Mrs. Chauncey M. Depew is a handsome woman, with very dark and expressive eyes, brown hair and a complexion of more than common clearness and brilliancy. Her nature is essentially social, and she is fitted, by reason of her polished manners, keen wit, and many graceful accomplishments, to assume a leading social position. She is devoted to charitable enterprises of all kinds.

Out of Tune.

Sweet little maid! whose golden-rippled head
Betwixt my grief and me its beauty rears
With quick demand for song—all singing's dead;
My heart is sad; I cannot sing for tears.

Nay, do not ask me why; I cannot sing—
Mine ill-tuned notes would do sweet music wrong;
I have no smile to greet the laughing spring,
No voice to join in summer's tide of song.

More from the forest's dying splendor takes
My heart its hymn, and fuller sympathy
Finds with the hurricane November wakes
To tear its tribute from each groaning tree.

Or when the last sere leaves in winter fall,
While all the world in grim frost-fetters lies,
I'll envy them the snowflakes' gentle pall
That hides their sorrows from the frowning skies.

Were it not sweet to slumber at Earth's breast,
O'er the mad scene to pull the curtain down,
Never to feel again the drear unrest
Of baffled love or unfulfilled renown—

The weariness of patient work uncrowned,
The bitter medicine of hope destroyed,
The fierce desire, the thing desired found
Void of enjoyment when at last enjoyed?

Nay, dear, not now; not yet! let the slow years
Fulfill their office. Oft at close of day
The far grim range all beautiful appears,
Kissed into kindness by the sunset ray.

So by-gone sorrow takes a tender hue;
So time can tinge the memory of pain;
Old songs are ever sweeter than the new,
And some day, sweet, we'll sing them all again.

Patrick and Pie.

When a man marries a woman he marries her country, says the adage. It becomes every such man to acquaint himself with the customs and the dominant sentiment of his wife's country, and especially to make himself familiar with the claims of prescriptive right set up by the womankind of that land.

Neglect of this has brought a well meaning Irishman living in a New England community into a badly battered case. Patrick married a Yankee girl, which was in itself a wise and excellent thing to do, as everybody will declare who knows the wily qualities inbred in New England girls.

But Patrick neglected to inform himself of the customs of his wife's country. He knew his wife to be placid and long suffering, submissive to conjugal criticism and disposed to improve herself under it. But he did not consider its limitations. In an unguarded moment he assailed the inner sanctuary of feminine New England's pride. He criticised the pie crust made by the New England girl whom he had taken to wife. Then came the reckoning: He, a mere Irishman, knowing pie only as a naturalized eater thereof, assumed to pass judgment upon the pie-making skill of the daughter of a hundred pie makers!

Fittingly choosing the means of remonstrance, the wife belabored him with the implement of her art. She showed him how pie was made by object lessons with the rolling pin;
and now Patrick languishes in a hospital, with a badly battered head and several broken bones.

"Served him right!" will be the verdict of every New England matron, who, modestly admitting her possible ignorance of the proper constitution of a ragout, could never regard criticism of her pie as aught else than a reflection upon the purity of her blood as a descendant of the Mayflower race.—N. Y. World.

The Aboma of Surinam.

On page 170 of volume I of "Stedman's Expedition to Surinam," is found the following wonderful account of the aboma or dragon:
"This remarkable creature is called aboma in the colony of Surinam. Its length, when full grown, is often more than forty feet, its body being four feet and over in circumference. Its color is a greenish-black on the back, a fine yellow on the sides, and a dirty white on the belly, the back and sides being spotted with irregular black rings, with a pure white spot in the center of each. Its head is broad and flat, small in proportion to its body, with a large mouth and teeth set in double rows. It has two bright, prominent eyes, is covered all over with scales about the size of a shilling, and has two sharp claws under the belly near the tail which it uses in seizing its prey. It is an amphibious animal, that is, it delights in low, marshy places, where it lies concealed under fallen timber, ready to seize its prey, which, from its immense bulk, it is not active enough to pursue. When hungry, it will devour any animal that comes within its reach, and is indifferent if it be a sloth, a wild boar, a stag or a tiger. After twisting itself about the body of a buffalo, a stag or a tiger, by help of its claws, it breaks every bone in the poor victim's body."

What a Bouquet Did.

Paris boulevard flower dealers have wonderful taste for arranging flowers. There is one of them—Madame Lion—whose reputation is European ever since an incident with which she happened to be connected got into the newspapers. One of the secretaries of the French embassy at St. Petersburg fell in love with one of the ladies-of-honor to the empress. Unluckily for the young diplomatist, she was already engaged to be married to a very wealthy and titled Muscovite;
but she could not help showing her preference for the noble Frenchman. Thereupon the Russian made such a scene that the lady went to the empress for protection. "Try to induce her majesty to accord your hand to whichever of us two shall produce the most beautiful bouquet," said the secretary to her; and she promised she would do so. The empress loved her very much indeed, and readily yielded to an arrangement which promised to be pleasant in any event. She sent for the young lady's father, who laughingly consented to all that was going on. Then the Russian gentleman was communicated with, and when he was informed that mademoiselle's hand was for him who gave her the most magnificent bouquet on that day fortnight—the empress herself to be the judge—he believed he would become her husband, and none other. But, confident in his great fortune and his own good taste, the Russian let the days pass, supposing all the time that his money could buy what he wanted at the last moment. The day arrived when the love gauge was to be decided.
The Russian noblemen advanced and presented an enormous bouquet. It was indeed beautiful, being made up of the rarest flowers that could be found in all Russia, and had cost something like 8,000 roubles. At the sight of it the young lady nearly fainted.
Surely it was impossible for her dear little diplomatist ever to excel such magnificence.
With a mocking smile on his lips, the count stepped forward, holding in his hand two gilded boxes. In polite language he said that one of the boxes contained a bouquet for the lady he loved; the other held a few flowers which he humbly begged that the empress would deign to accept. Then he handed the two ladies each her bouquet, and immediately all those present saw that he had won; for never before was there such a lovely combination of color and perfume as in those which he himself had brought from Paris (for the instant that the gauge had been thrown down he applied for leave of absence). It took nearly two days to get it, and then he started for Paris. Arriving there, he rode straight to a famous flower shop and told the proprietress what he wanted. That night at 8 o'clock he was on his way back to Russia; and in the large basket, which he looked after carefully day and night, were nittos, sonvenirs de Malma-ison and gardenia, and these three most lovely roses were set about with white lilacs.
Such a bouquet was never seen in the Russian capital, and the empress, without delay, awarded the count the young lady's hand.
They were married, and are now living in Vienna, to which embassy he was promoted only a few months ago.

They Were Newspaper Men.

A most remarkable feature about the men of the present century and, in particular, of the present generation, is the fact that they nearly all have served, at one time or another, an apprenticeship either with the press or else with some publishing house.
Thus, in England, the Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury, was a regular salaried writer for a couple of the big London metropolitan newspapers prior to his succeeding to the marquisate, while Mr. Smith, the First Lord of the Treasury, commenced his life as a newsboy and became the head of the greatest publishing house in Great Britain. In Italy almost every great statesman either is or has been connected with journalism. Cavour was editor of the Risorgimento; Crispi owns the Reformi; Mazzini was a member of the staff of the Apostollato, while the names of Minghetti, Nicotera and Depretis have figured as newspaper men. In France need only be mentioned Thiers, Gambetta; Rouvier, the present Minister of Finance; Lockroy, Leon Say, and in fact every other minister who has held office during the past eighteen years. In Spain the same state of affairs prevails, Sagasta, Castellar and Canovas having each of them attained fame as editors.
Even in the conservative empire of Austro-Hungary we find the Imperial Minister of Finance figuring as proprietor and editor of the Hungarian newspaper Nepes.

"Bulls" in History.

Grave historical writers are occasionally guilty of what are called "Hibernicisms."
The following passage occurs in a popular history of France:
"It is extremely doubtful whether this Prince, Merovaens, ever existed at all; but he had a son, Childeric, whose existence is well authenticated."
The following is also from a historical work:
"—Like Samson of old, who, armed only with the jawbone of an ass, put 1100 Philistines to the sword."

Repinings.

Oh! would that love could die,
And memories cease to be!
What a foolish kiss and a sigh
Were nothing more to me!

Oh! would that a summer day,
A stroll mid the rustling corn,
Could pass from my heart away
Like the little clouds at morn!

Ah me! for the starry night,
The glow-worm under the rose,
The talk in the fading light,
Which only one sad heart knows.

Ah me! for the day's surprise,
The love in a parting look,
The watching of wistful eyes,
For the morrow that never broke.

CHIQUITA.

"Ned" Herries, or, as his card read, "Edward T. Herries, C. E.," stood in the doorway of the Rough Diamond and looked gloomily forth at the rain as it fell aslant the cactus growth and chapparal on the red soil of the mesa. From the saloon within came the rattle of dice, the clink of glass, the rattle of coin and the murmur of deep, hoarse male voices. The Rough Diamond was a most lucrative and flourishing institution in the little railroad town of Picture Canyon, on the line of the Union Pacific. It was one of those places which at that time sprang up in a night and are deserted in a day, along the line of the great road. Indeed, they followed the track, and wherever track-laying ended temporarily there a town was certain to spring up—almost as if by magic. There were thousands of laborers, railroad men, engineers and speculators. With them came peddlers, storekeepers, and last, but not least, the great army of gamblers and saloon men. Some of these towns were located in advantageous situations, and finally took on a solid growth and prospered. Others, having nothing to justify their existence save the presence of the army of railroad employees, vanished utterly when that army advanced farther and farther on its mission of conquering space and time and binding east and west together with bands of steel.

Herries was attached to the engineer corps of the road, and had been for some time stationed at Picture Canyon, a city of some 5,000 inhabitants, mostly males, and which was nearly a month old, so antique, indeed, that an election for mayor and common council was being agitated by the more enterprising members of the community.

Harvard-bred, delicately nurtured, accustomed to all the refinements of life which wealth guided by correct tastes may give in an old and settled community, the rude surroundings of his present life had at first disheartened Herries, but being at bottom a man of good sense and pluck, and possessing a splendid constitution, a magnificent biceps, standing six feet and over in his boots, the man who had been Yale's especial terror as "right tackle," and who had filled his seat in the 'varsity eight with more than credit when the blue crossed the line ahead of the crimson, on Lake Quinsigamond, would hardly flinch at hardships which other men bore without complaint, even if at times his soul grew weary of oaths and liquor, mad-dened men and brawls, and bacon and muddy coffee and hardtack. Indeed, he grew at last to like the wild freedom of his life, as all men will do in time, and he was fast taking on the exterior of a genuine frontiersman when he—

When he met Chiquita!

Chiquita was a sprite. She was the true daughter of rocky canyon and desert mesa—a genuine child of the Sierras—and a woman withal. Her reputed father was an evil-eyed old Mexican named Ramon; ostensibly a herder of other men's sheep; really a gatherer of other men's coins. Chiquita kept house for him in a tumbled-together "shack," on the outskirts of the town, and here entertained her father's guests. Poor little Chiquita. She was brilliantly pretty, with the rich rose red flushing her olive cheeks, her white teeth flashing between ripe, dewy, crimson lips with glorious brown eyes, under heavy arching brows, and shaded by such long, curling lashes as would make one's heart ache, especially the heart of a frontiersman, in whose life female beauty is a rich and rare event. Many a dollar had Chiquita's eyes and lips brought to old Ramon's sheepskin pouch—and still he was athirst for more gold.

It was of this Herries was thinking, for he knew Chiquita, and it was this which, thinking of it, drove him out of the warm and cozy barroom (the only place where he could possibly stay, save in his cold and cheerless tent), and forced him to lave his heated brow in the cool, wet wind which blew from the mouth of Picture Canyon.

He was roused by a voice—a deep, slow plainsman's voice—addressing him:

"Pardner, you are a good one for a tenderfoot, leastways I've sorter tackled to you since I seen the way you whupped that 'ere cowboy clump, and belted him with his own gun. Some tenderfoots ain't got no sand, but you have, en I'll not see you double teamed on ef I kin help it, sho's I'm fun Texas—which I'm known as Black Waxy Jim."

"Why, what's the matter?" broke in Herries on Black Waxy's harrangue, as he turned and regarded closely the tall, athletic figure of the man beside him.

The Texan jerked his thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the bar-room. "In thar," he said in a low tone, "I heern somethin'—about—about you—en—en—"

"Chiquita?"

"Thet's it, pard. You've called the turn. It's jest about that 'ere little greaser gal, en you ain't the fust, nor you won't be the larst, I reckon, thet's got his hide bored 'long o' her."

"What's up, then?"

"Keep yer eye skinned—and don't go nigh old Ramon's shack. I've warned you. So long, pard. And Black Waxy lounged away into the gathering gloom and mist.

"Hold on," cried Herries, rushing after him. "Tell me, at least, who my enemy is," Black Waxy turned and scanned the young engineer closely in the twilight. "Pete—from Denver!" he jerked out, and strode rapidly off.

Herries was a brave man, but his blood chilled at that mention of this name. It was the synonym of all that was most fierce, bloodthirsty and wicked, even in that wicked and bloodthirsty little community. "Denver Pete!" he mused. "So he is going to do me up because I'm trying to win that poor child from her horrible life, and save her for something better. I fear me, Edward, you're in no end of a bad scrape."

But the blood which had rushed so hotly through his veins when Yale's shouts rang triumphant over the football field as the goal was almost won, and which nerved him to dare any odds, take any risk, so long as he could save that game, now flowed again warmly through his heart. "I'll not be bullied," he said, and he frowned and shut close his mouth and clinched his hands. These were ominous signs in Mr. Herries, and even Denver Pete, redoubtable knight of the green cloth as he was, would have done well to have heeded them; had he known young Herries better he might have done so. For Herries had stalked back to the brilliantly lighted barroom, and had called for a glass of whisky, the while he regarded a knot of men near by who were conversing in a low tone. Among these men was the gambler against whom Herries had been warned—a handsome, pale-faced, tall, slender man, dressed with great neatness in black, and without a single ornament visible—not even the belt which nearly every man wore. He had a small, keen, hungry-looking gray eye, and as he looked at Herries he met the latter's gloomy glance, smiled and turned to his friends with the remark:

"The kid seems worried about something. I wonder if by any chance he has overheard us?"

"Guess not—he jest come in a minute ago."

"Perhaps—perhaps," muttered Peter; "but we will soon know."

Events move quickly in frontier towns. As Herries finished his whisky and banged the door behind him, Peter arose from his seat.

His friends also sprang up, but he made a gesture of dissent.

"No, boys. Leave this to me. If I can't deal with one tenderfoot, I certainly won't call in aid."

"But he might git the drap on ye," persisted one.

Peter shrugged his shoulders and deigned no reply. He walked to the bar, called for and swallowed a large glassful of brandy, which draft did not even bring a flush to his pale cheek, opened the door, and was lost in the darkness of the night.

About two hours later the inmates of the Rough Diamond were startled by hearing shots, cries, oaths, the heavy thundering of a horse's hoofs on the rocky soil of the mesa, and then a long, loud "hurra-a-h." Then all was silent.

As one man they sprang to their feet and rushed for the door, but ere the foremost man among them could reach it, it was burst violently open and old Ramon rushed in, followed by Pete from Denver, who, swaying and staggering like a drunken man, called for brandy, and then came to the floor with a crash that shook the windows.

A babel of voices prevented an explanation for a long time, and when Peter had somewhat revived he told them what had happened.

"Where's Chiquita?" some one asked.

A spasm of wrath convulsed the features of the dying man.

"Gone," he gasped, "gone with that cursed tenderfoot."

"How did it all happen, Pete?"

"He was there when I got there. Chiquita was all dressed and ready to go off with him; womanlike, curse her! He saw me coming. His horse was there. He waited for me. Oh, the fellow was game enough. I said nothing, but opened on him. The girl being there must have made me nervous, for I missed my man for the first time."

"And then?"

"Why, he pumped me full of lead before I could pull trigger. Hit me five times. Then he mounted and swung the girl up in front of him. Old Ramon came up and opened on him. I got up and followed suit.

He got back at us once—his last cartridge—and caught Ramon, for I heard him groan. Then the tenderfoot yelled and rode off. Boys, give me a big drink. I'm done for."

And when they brought the drink a fast chilling corpse was all that was left of Peter from Denver to drink it.

And Chiquita? Chiquita went to a convent in St. Louis, and left there four years later a cultured and magnificently beautiful woman. She will be pleased to receive any of Mr. Herries' friends at her lovely home in the Back bay district in Boston, and if you succeed in pleasing her, she will tell you of that awful night at Picture Canyon when a "tenderfoot" from Boston showed how a "tenderfoot" can fight when a sweetheart is at stake.

And old Ramon? When they looked for him he was gone. Nor was he or Edward Herries ever seen again in Picture Canyon.

Almost as Easy as Divorce.

The joke on the Georgia rural justice of the peace has gained that worthy personage a national reputation. But the latest and best story in this line comes fresh from a Georgia county.

A runaway couple, pursued by an angry father, rushed into the bedroom of a sleeping justice and demanded an immediate marriage.

Arrayed in a flowing gown of white, the startled justice leaped from his couch and, seeing a woman present, as quickly leaped behind the bed.

"What do you want?" he thundered, peering wildly over the headboard.

"Want to get married!" shouted the man.

"Take her and go, and God help you!" cried the justice.

And the nuptial knot was tied.

Hasty Friendships.

Some people are continually acquiring "dear friends." Ladies of an impressive nature have been known to add two or three to their list every week during the visiting season. Men are not, generally speaking, as apt to rush into friendship as the more amiable sex, yet many a man contracts friendships in haste that he repents at leisure. True friends are scarce acquisitions. They cannot be picked up at the rate of half a dozen a season at dinner parties or balls.—New York Ledger.

KATIE E. CLARK.

Who Was Jim?

Some visitors to the town bring with them good stories of incidents that happened in their personal knowledge. It is astonishing to see how few of the current new stories are carried from town to town by the press. The vast majority are carried and scattered by travelers and drummers. Some of the stories told by the drummers, however, should never have been scattered; still, the commercial men are the authors of many a good story that shows individuality in its make-up.

A Simmons hardware salesman tells of a sleeping-car incident that happened a few nights ago as he was coming from Chicago in a Chicago and Alton night train.

There was a bridal couple on the train, who had been billing and cooing the entire evening. Finally the curtains of their berth were drawn down, and from the rustling of silks within, one could tell the girl was disrobing. Finally all was silent. About midnight the groom, who seemed unaccustomed to travel, arose, dressed and looked around the train, got a drink and spent an hour listening to the chatter of some night owls who were talking in the smoking-room.

When he returned to his couch he found his bride lying with her head at the northwest corner and her feet at the southeast corner of the berth. The groom could not find a place to rest his bones, so he touched her and said: "Rachael! Rachael! lie over a little."

There was no answer but a snoring "Ugh?" "Rachael! Rachael! I have no room to lie down."

Another "Ugh?" He gave her a nudge or two and repeated the request.

Then came in half-awake, half-asleep tones: "Oh, Jim—you—always—wake me—and nudge me; you mean thing!" She rolled over and went to sleep again.

The groom looked surprised. His name wasn't Jim, and he didn't think he had married a widow. He had only been married two days, so he didn't think that she could say of him that he "always awoke her and nudged her."

The next morning the drummer and his friend heard the husband ask his wife:

"Say, Rachael, who in blazes is Jim?" "Why, that's my little sister's nickname. You know her by the name of Lizzie; we call her Jim. Why do you ask?"

"Oh, nothing," was the answer, but he looked satisfied and happy.

Like Him All But His Bow Legs.

She entered a street car. You could tell she'd just come from the shore by her face—last winter blonde, but now as red as a beet, with an occasional freckle.

"Just a l-o-o-v-e-ly time," was her gushing reply to a pretty brunette friend as she thumped into the corner seat beside her. "Oh, I just d-o-o-o love the shore. Never went to so many nice teas and parties—and dancing—why, I'm most dead from it. I could die a-waltzing, y'know."

"And, Fannie," she gushingly continued, "I never met so m-a-n-y bald-headed men. Why, it's getting to be just dreadful the way the men are growing bald. They should use restoratives—it's dreadful."

"Yes," chirped in the summer girl. "There were a good many bald heads. And—"

"But how about Charley?" interrupted the pretty brunette; "you said he was l-o-v-e-ly in your last letter."

There was a quick, surprised look, a short gurgle, and the pretty blonde pitifully replied: "Poor fellow! He was an awful nice boy. Nice talker—danced well—and I adored him until the other day, when he did something."

"Why, what did he do?" was the quick interrogative.

"He went in bathing," poutingly.

"Well, that's nothing."

"Yes, it was"—proudly—"yes, indeed, it was. Why, do you think—do you think," squaring herself face to face with her brunette friend, "that I would go with a bow-legged man?"

The car stopped and the sun-burned blonde got out.

A Singular Horse.

A funny story is told of Dean Swift, who was a witty man and fond of a joke at the expense of other people, as most witty people are. One very cold night when he was traveling he stopped at a little inn. There was only one fire in the house, and the guests of the inn, crowding about it, left no place for the new-comer.

With a solemn face Dean Swift called to the hostler and told him to get a peck of oysters immediately and take them out to his horse.

"Will your horse eat oysters, sir?" asked the astonished man.

"Just take them out and see," said the horse's master.

Few people die of the peril they most fear; says a student of casualties. Rope-walker Dixon, who crossed 350 feet above the whirlpool rapids at Niagara on a three-quarter-inch cable last July, has just drowned while bathing. So, the man who fears the gout may go untwinged all his days only to slip on a banana peel.

What is the matter with the old man? If there is any one achievement of the fund commission for which Judge Beatty prides himself more than another, and of which he has oftener boasted, it is that of buying from Meyer, Bates & Co. long-term (1903) bonds at par. This wonderful feat in finance—deep beyond the ken of ordinary mortals—of inducing creditors to accept from an insolvent and would-be repudiating city (for such it has often been declared to be by our venerable financier) before their money is due, is defended upon the ground that, by so doing, the city gets rid of paying the unearned interest which would accrue during the next twelve years. He puts it, in his communication to the Record-Union of October 28th, in substance as follows:

In the 1903 bonds the city promises to pay, say $1,000, on the 1st day of February, 1903. But attached to that bond are thirteen "coupons," or, in plain English, thirteen promissory notes. Twelve of these notes are for $60 each and one for $5. Now, when we buy a 1903 $1000-bond at par and get $725 in notes thrown in without pay, we save the city $725 on each $1,000-bond by paying in advance.

The policy of this idea of paying its debts before they are due, on the part of an over-taxed city, embarrassed and distressed for want of means for current necessities, instead of paying its past due debts, seems, when seen in its naked deformity, even to have slightly shocked the sensibilities of its over-wrought devotee, for he presently adds:

But I am free to admit with the saving in interest and discount, which we make by buying up the debt before it is due, would not induce me to favor a high rate of taxation.

This is a very kind concession from a commission which abstracts from the city from $90,000 to $100,000 annually—the products of taxation—for use in questionable plans for satisfying the cravings of Meyer, Bates & Co. And yet, if it was a sincere confession, it was soon forgotten, for only two days later, in a communication to the Evening News, our financier says:

For myself, I believe it would be the best policy to raise the 35-cent tax [referring to an additional tax] and clean the whole thing up in three and one-half years.

It is evident that high taxation has no terrors for the president of the fund commission; and it is quite certain that the San Francisco syndicate of bondholders would not object.

But it is to be noted that this plan of another 35-cent tax is not suggested for the purpose of raising money to buy up bonds maturing in 1898 and 1903, but for the purpose of paying, in one fell swoop, the past-due bonds and coupons, as well as the bonds which mature in 1893. With reference to this grand idea, our financier furnishes the following information and advice:

But there is a law under which the commissioners can require the trustees to levy annually 35 cents on all the taxable property of the city for bond-redemption purposes. If that amount was levied each year, up to and including March, 1895—three and one-half years—we could take up all the delinquent debt, leaving only a small amount of bonds, that would fall due partly in 1898 and partly in 1903.

An approximately close estimate will show that this 35-cent tax will produce $52,500 per year. The average receipt of the interest and sinking fund is $150,000 per year. For the four years from 1892 to 1895, both inclusive, there would be produced from these sources $810,000—a sum quite sufficient, and probably more than sufficient, to pay off at par the whole delinquent debt, together with the bonds maturing in 1893; and this is just what the San Francisco syndicate wants. The policy of the commission has been to create as much delinquent debt as possible. Accordingly, during the last twelve years it has purchased only $7,400 of the bonds which matured in 1888, and but a little more of the bonds which will mature in 1893, using its enormous resources in the purchase of the bonds maturing in 1898 and 1903. The result is that the city is now delinquent in the sum of $315,000 unpaid bonds of 1888, and in fourteen months more will be delinquent in the further sum of $266,800 for bonds of 1893—making a total delinquency upon the bonds, exclusive of interest, of $581,800. The commission has purchased $515,600 of the long bonds (1898, 1903) and has engaged, as it says, to purchase $57,000 more.

This miserable condition is due to the fact that this commission, contrary to the purposes for which it was created, has used the enormous sums at its disposal to pay debts which we don't owe, rather than the debts that we do owe; and it enables its manager, with apparent satisfaction, to publish to the world our situation in such words as these: "Everywhere in the civilized world, from Siberia to Chile, we are discredited. All strangers believe the city insolvent," etc. Our condition is not so bad as thus represented, yet it serves the purpose of the manager of the commission to assert it. What object is gained by stigmatizing the city with insolvency and repudiation, as has been often done by the manager of this commission, is not readily perceived. It can't help the commission in buying bonds, for it purchases only of the San Francisco syndicate. The latter may profit by it by gathering up the bonds from the four corners of the earth at low prices, from the holder whose ears are filled with lamentations over the alleged insolvency and repudiating tendencies of this unfortunate and commission-ridden city.

But there is hope yet. The end is nigh at hand. Light is beginning to penetrate the minds of the commissioner and his solitary convert. In the latest communication of the former to the latter he says in mournful and pathetic words: "I agree with you partly that those bonds not due need not be taken up. It would be folly to attempt to take them up. When the commission has paid the delinquent bonds and coupons our occupation is gone. The city has no further use for us"—meaning, probably, no further use for the fund commission; not, it is to be hoped, for the venerable commissioner himself, and his enterprising convert, the editor of the News. They should be preserved as useful examples for future financiers who may attempt to explain the folly of attempting to take up the bonds not due, and the wisdom of at the same time contracting to buy $57,000 more of them at par. Could the occupation be gone without further delay the taxpayers of the city would loudly say amen! and amen! would not stick in their throats at the proposition that it would have been well for the city if the commission had never been created.

Now that the various political organizations have acted with regard to nominations for school officers, the matter of the election is fairly before the people, and it is gratifying ample time will be afforded for careful deliberation. Heretofore the importance of this election seems not to have been appreciated, and the selection of nominees was made by political committees. Since the establishment of THEMIS we have repeatedly called attention to the dangers of the system; that it brought politics too near the schools, and gave the people little or no voice in the selections of school officers. We have no criticism adverse of the present board of education, and feel it would be difficult to improve on its personnel, but it has happened in the past that in instances there have been abuses, and men incompetent or designing have found places on the board. Politics has its place; its place is not, however, in the school and library boards. Educated men of broad views; men who will not be swayed from their convictions, but who will act with intelligence, justice and good judgment, should be returned. It should be understood that the teachers will be retained if their records are satisfactory, and that favoritism will not give one an advantage over others. The incentive of promotion because of merit should be held out. As we remarked in a former issue, there should not be held over their heads the sword of Damocles, sustained by a slender thread, that is liable to be severed by an unjust hand.

It is evident that the national issue next year will be protection and reciprocity. The arbitrament on Tuesday in Ohio fixes and determines the great contest for president. Every effort was made to defeat Wm. McKinley by the democracy and their allies, the side-shows. The battle was fought and won solely upon protection and reciprocity, and these will be the watch-words for republican victory next year. In all the other states there were no national questions involved. Flower in New York, Russell in Massachusetts and Boies in Iowa, succeed on personal popularity. As the smoke of the conflict clears away, it becomes more and more apparent that our matchless statesman, James G. Blaine, will be the standard-bearer, with the inscription "protection and reciprocity" thereon. With Blaine, New York will fall into line; Massachusetts and Iowa will discard their side issues; Illinois and Indiana rally in support of the American idea as personified in Blaine. The lessons of the Tuesday elections will not be lost on the grand old republican party, and will serve to solidify all the conflicting elements under the slogan protection and reciprocity. The lines are drawn: The republicans for the protection of American industries, and the democracy for the protection of foreign labor and manufactures. With such an issue, the American idea must prevail. There is no room now in the republican ranks for mugwumpism.

THEMIS was laughed at. Indeed it is that he who laughs last laughs best. We are sorry that our opponents in the discussion of the subject of the bonded indebtedness find they have been compelled to retire ignominiously from the field. We will, however, renew it at appropriate times, to the end the oppressive taxation of this people will be lightened. It has come to be that "They laugh that win."

The San Francisco Post has devised an advertising scheme to "popularize" itself that should be generally condemned. It prints a schedule of prizes, with their individual valuations fixed by the publishers—valuations which everyone of common sense knows to be exaggerated—and proposes during the remainder of the year to print a blank ballot daily that it is expected will be cut out, filled in and returned to the office, presumptively to determine who are the most popular lady teachers in the State; really to attempt to build up a newspaper circulation at the expense of the public schools. Such a fake will determine nothing as to the genuine popularity of those who may be successful; to our mind it is indelicate. The Post says:

The plan proposed by the Post for conferring a substantial benefit on faithful and deserving lady teachers in this state cannot fail to commend itself to parents and children alike. The former are not ungrateful nor undimindful of the exhaustive toil and labor to which a teacher is subjected, and in many cases would be glad to show their appreciation of the teachers' self-sacrifice in some substantial way. This, however, can be done only indirectly, for the law wisely forbids, at least in the public schools, the making of presents to teachers.

The children, of course, will be more than pleased to show their esteem and regard for their teachers, and to indicate their confidence in them in the simple manner provided for by this paper. Children are, as a rule, excellent judges of character, and their verdict will be quite as near the exact truth as that of other jurors, to say the least.

Such a plan should unquestionably not commend itself to thinking parents, and while the children are always pleased to show and do show their appreciation for their teachers, there are more appropriate ways of doing it than by booming up a sensational newspaper. The Post admits the wisdom of the law forbidding making presents to teachers. Mainly the law is based upon the idea that a deserving teacher should be recognized substantially—by promotion,—and that her merit, so far as her pupils are concerned, should be judged by their records. Then again, there is considered the disparity in the conditions in life of the parents of the children; the humiliation of the poor child that he cannot give as much as his more fortunate seat-mate. The "popularity" of a teacher does not always mean that she is deserving of special merit. The modest are in many instances the most deserving of recognition and advancement.

It is to be hoped our evening contemporaries will not get into a fight over the question which is the greater or which the lesser. Let them furnish the people the news, and each attend to its own internal business. What do the people care for their troubles, or as to which has the most influence and circulation? We all know each will claim the most for itself and will stretch the very longest bow.

Poetry is an appropriate subject of criticism. In a San Francisco paper of recent date, Sands W. Forman printed a poem he had written, entitled "Egypt's Queen"—referring to one of the name of Cleopatra, the last Queen of Egypt, who was born in 69 B. C., and died August 30, 30 B. C., at the early age of 39. Doubtless there were some good traits about the woman, but she played havoc with the leading men of Rome. Imperial Cæsar forgot his obligations to his people and his family that he might revel in her smiles. The untimely death of Cæsar brought Antony to her feet; she destroyed the family relations of Antony, brought to him military defeat and death. In the play of Antony and Cleopatra Shakspeare graphically presents the language of the several parties concerned in the political, warlike and domestic affairs that then transpired. The great playwright is no doubt responsible for the more modern poems that have from time to time appeared. Seriously, however, while we have no admiration for the life and character of Cleopatra, we confess admiration for the production written by Wm. H. Lytle, of Ohio, who was killed at Chicamauga, popularly entitled, "I am Dying, Egypt, Dying." There is merit, too, in the verses of Mr. Forman, but there is much in them of sameness to past productions. He lays the cause of the death of the queen to the sting of an adder; history generally ascribes it to an asp.

A letter from Rev. J. B. Harrison, of Boston, has been received by Rev. C. W. Wendte, of San Francisco, stating that Samuel Woodworth, the author of the "Old Oaken Bucket," was buried either in San Francisco or Oakland; and the inquiry is made, where the body lies, and whether the grave is marked by a monument. Though we never knew the remains of the poet were brought to California, if they were, it seems it will be of little difficulty to find their resting-place. Woodworth died in New York, December 9, 1842. His collected poems, with a memoir, were published in New York in 1861, and the city of his last resting-place should be noted in the memoir. It is not unlikely his remains were brought to California, in that his second son, Selim E. Woodworth, was a prominent early Californian. He was born in New York, November 15, 1815; went to sea in 1832; entered the United States navy in 1838; came overland to California by way of Oregon, and arrived here April 1, 1846; was a senator from Monterey the first and second sessions of the legislature, and in a manuscript sketch of his life, written by himself while senator, now in possession of the Sacramento Society of Pioneers, he closed with the words, "Son of the 'Old Oaken Bucket.'" His portrait and biographical sketch appear in the "Annals of San Francisco." He died at the bay, January 29, 1871. No doubt the remains of his father lie in his plot, if they were brought to this coast, and there should be no difficulty to locate them.

There is prevalent in many portions of this country an idea that a child cannot be sent too early to school, nor kept too steadily at the tasks there undertaken. The most melancholy results have already arisen from this grave error, and we fear that future generations may exhibit a still greater average of consequent suffering. The fact is, that the brain is far more liable to be overtaken in early youth than the body. The precocious child—unnaturally precocious, we mean—the growth of the educational hotbed—is never a superior man. What we rob from nature at ten years of age, she takes back again at five-and-twenty, with a justice inexorable. On the contrary, it is a notorious fact, adduced by a great majority of biographical researches, that the most celebrated and successful men have, as a general rule, not been remarkable as children, but have rather devoted themselves to the establishment of a permanently sound physique, than a brilliant intellect. Some curious statistics gathered in England, a few years ago, show that nothing is more fatal to the national intelligence than this early forcing. It was found that the average of precocious children who reached the age of twenty-one was frightfully small, compared with those who exhibited ordinary mental power. Those who lived to manhood were nearly all very delicate, and, by a curious reactionary power of nature, were singularly apt to have children of a very low order of intellect—many of them being decidedly idiotic. This shows that the early forcing plan, pursued in far too great a proportion of our schools, is actually one cause of the increase of insanity and idiocy that our census-tables and medical statistics record. The power of the United States lies, without doubt, in the educational opportunities that all American citizens find here, but every good thing is liable to abuse, and we protest against making the acquirement of abstract knowledge the sole and only occupation of children who need every advantage of exercise and open air life to bring them to physical maturity.

Scientists generally have concluded that mankind is deteriorating. He is of shorter life, and smaller in stature. All else is improving at the expense of man's individuality. Edward P. Jackson, in the North American Review, claims that, while we are making great and rapid strides in the master of the forces in nature, still man is losing in consequence of the great advancement in this power over nature. We are better housed, lighted, warmed, clothed, and fed than ever before; are better protected from disease, yet, as an individual, deteriorating. With all our advantages, we do not gain a larger sphere, but are simply sharpened to a finer point. The Review writer puts the situation in strong terms:

The world has already made too much history and eminent biography. The broadest mind, the most tenacious memory, can comprehend but the barest outlines, and for adequate study must content itself with fragments. The same applies to science, art, everything. Hence, everywhere the race of man is told off into details. The intellectual class divides up its domain into lots, and assigns them to its settlers, as the United States Government assigns its territorial freeholds. The sky is partitioned off among astronomers like so much western territory. In philology one man devotes his life to the third declension of one language, and at the end laments that he "has not confined himself to the dative case." In the arts it is still worse. Time was when one man made a watch. Now he makes only one small part of it. As a result the product is greatly improved, but the producer is deteriorated in still greater degree. Enlarging the scope of action in all directions, when the scope was already too large, has very much the same effect that enlarging the earth itself would have—it proportionately diminishes the individual actor. When, countless æons hence, Jupiter and Saturn shall be inhabited, the Jovian and the Saturnian man will be as much smaller than the terrestrial man as those giant planets are greater than the earth. Not so, however, with the Jovian and the Saturnian races. For our hundreds they will number their tens of thousands.

We cull the following from Harper's for November, 1891:

THE FORCE OF HABIT.

A story illustrating the force of habit, as related by a clergyman who claimed to have heard it in its spontaneity, seems good enough to repeat.

A college professor and his daughter sat at a hotel table with the narrator of the story. In the course of conversation the professor, wishing to express negation, made use of the objectionable form "nope."

"Father," said the daughter, energetically, "you shouldn't say 'nope;' you should say no."

"I suppose so, my dear," acquiesced the father. "It is the force of habit that makes me say nope."

"Why, father, have you always said nope?" inquired the young lady.

The father reflected for a moment. A dreamy smile lit up his features, and he gently and peacefully murmured "Yep."

DINAH'S PRAYER.

Dinah is fond of good living, but, strange to say, has an intense dislike for clams, and did not hesitate to make this fact known when called upon to ask a blessing. Dinah said:

"O Lord, bless all dese good vittles—all 'cept dem clams—you don't get any of dem inter me! Amen."

A VERY EASY LANGUAGE.

"Ibrahim" (Abraham), said a European traveler in Palestine to his native guide, "I want you to teach me some Arabic. If I wish to go into an Arab's house, how am I to say to him 'Let me rest here, and give me some food?'"

"You needn't say anything at all to him, effendi" (master), "but just walk in and sit down. As for food, if it is his meal-time he will give you some without being asked; and if it is not, you won't get any, whatever you say."

"And if I want to buy anything from him, how do I ask the price of it?"

"You don't ask it, master, but just point to the thing and show him some money. If it is not enough, he'll hold out his hand for more; and if he does not give you enough of the things that you want to buy, whatever they are, you hold out your hand for more, and so it goes on till you are both satisfied."

"And in case we fall in with robbers, what's the Arabic for 'Halt! or I fire?'"

"There is no Arabic needed in that case, master. If there were only a single robber, my comrade Yakob" (Jacob) "and I would kill him before he could say a word; and if there were a band of them they would kill us before we could say one."

"And supposing I want to climb up on to the roof of a house to look at the view, what shall I say to the people of the house?"

"Say nothing at all, but just climb right up. Then the people to whom the house belongs will climb up after you and ask for money, and you'll give them some."

"And if they are not satisfied with what I give them, and begin to threaten me, what shall I say to them?"

"Don't say a word; just whistle for me," replied Ibrahim, with stern significance.

"But if I am thirsty, and see a man coming along with a pitcher of water, how am I to say in Arabic 'Give me a drink?'"

"Don't say it at all, effendi; just catch hold of the pitcher, take a drink, and pass on."

"And supposing I go into a native village, and see there a pretty girl whom I wish to compliment," asked the traveler, with a somewhat sentimental air, "how am I to express in Arabic 'You are a beautiful child?'"

Ibrahim's small black eyes twinkled appreciatively. "If you take my advice, effendi, you will not try to express that at all, for if you do, her father and her friends will come up and begin throwing big stones at you?"

"Oho!" cried the traveler; "do you speak from experience, my friend?"

Ibrahim answered only by rubbing the back of his head with a meaning grin; and here the Arabic lesson ended, the traveler being by this time fully convinced that Arabic, if studied in the right way, is one of the easiest languages in existence. DAVID KER.

A STORY OF NAPOLEON III.

Napoleon III, who had no fewer poor relatives to help on than any other sovereign, was trying one day to convince a cousin, whom he had already generously aided, that it was impossible for him to increase her allowance. The princess took the refusal angrily, and, as she was leaving, said, in a taunting manner: "Decidedly you have nothing of the great emperor, our uncle."

"You mistake, ma chère cousine," replied Napoleon, with a cheerful smile, "I have his family."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

One can hardly expect a basso profundo to pursue the even tenor of his way.

"Ah, yes," said Aunt Sary, "Jennie's a great singer; some day she'll be a reg'lar belladonna!"

A French critic, Mirabeau, says Maurice Maeterlinck, a new writer in Belgium, has put into his Princesse Maeline "things more beautiful than the most beautiful things in Shakspeare."

Author (of new play in far western theater)—Hark! What's that queer noise? Western manager—Comes from the audience. "Eh! Is that their style of applauding?" "No. It's the clicking of revolvers. I think they are getting ready to call for the author."

The famous tenor Van Dyck, who has been hailed as the greatest of living male singers, lacks the height and grace of bearing of the beau ideal tenor. He is short and stout, and his closely shaven chin and lips, delicate features and long fair hair give him an almost feminine aspect.

Emma V. Sheridan says there is "no more sensation in a stage kiss than there is in a stage murder. Stage kisses should be illusion as much as stage fire or stage snow. Murdering and fighting, shouting and kissing are done on the stage because the lines or the situations of the play demand them."

Theatrical stars, as a rule, says the New York Commercial Advertiser, are so jealous of the applause and attention attaching to their position at the head of the cast that the introduction of a more than usually effective line or piece of business by a member of it is generally frowned down. Joseph Jefferson is particularly free from this petty weakness. At rehearsals he is lavish with invaluable suggestions for the players who support him, and everything that his fertile mind can devise to strengthen their individual work is done, though sometimes it is at the cost of his own scenes and situations. In connection with this fact the following is told of a rehearsal of The Rivals, which took place recently: Mrs. John Drew, as Mrs. Malaprop, introduced in one of her scenes a new and striking line accompanied by a tremendously funny bit of business. With old-time professional courtesy she called Mr. Jefferson's attention to the innovation, and asked if he had any objection to it. "Not the slightest," replied the comedian, bowing, "it's exactly what Sheridan would have done—if he'd thought of it."

In the Century for November Brander Matthews has given a splendid description of "The Players," the designation of a club in New York, which includes in its membership actors, managers, dramatists, and lovers of art. We clip the following from the elegant article: In the oaken cases which stretch from one fireplace to the other is the private collection of Mr. Booth, the working library of a Shaksperian tragedian. Beyond and between the farther mantelpiece and the rear window is a major part of the theatrical collection of Mr. Lawrence Barrett; and opposite are the dramatic books of the late John Gilbert, a welcome gift from his widow. Other friends have filled most of the other shelves; and the gathering grows apace. Among the treasures, for example, is a collection of some 30,000 playbills, and over a hundred volumes of original editions of the elder dramatists, presented by Mr. Daly. In a shrine over a cabinet are half a dozen death-masks, from the unequaled collection of Mr. Laurence Hutton; and thus we may see how the author of The School for Scandal looked after he had departed this life, and the author of Faust, and the author of The Robbers. There are death-masks also of David Garrick and of Edmund Kean, of Marie Malibran, and of Ludwig Devrient, of Boucicault, and of Lawrence Barrett, sad memorials of departed beauty, genius, and power. Above the shelves where the dust settles on their biographies and on the comedies and the tragedies they acted, are the portraits of the players of the past. No other collection of theatrical pictures approaches this in extent or in importance save that of the Garrick club in London. As the gallery of the Garrick was begun by the purchase of the pictures got together by Charles Matthews, so that of The Players had its germ in the portraits gathered by Mr. John Sleeper Clarke, a comedian who has acted with abundant success more than one of Matthews' characters. To the small collection of his brother-in-law, Mr. Booth added many others; and since the club has opened, and since the fact has become known that it will gladly accept and care for portraits of actors, not a few have been presented, as always happens when the public is aware that gifts of this sort are welcome. The two-score and more portraits in the library are all theatrical in their subjects—except that there is here a picture, supposed to be by Rembrandt Peale, of George Washington, who, under George III, was the active leader of his majesty's opposition. It was for this painting that Mr. Aldrich suggested the properly theatrical legend, "Our Leading Man."

The difference between an editor and his wife is that his wife sets things to rights, while he writes things to set.

In fiction, as in history, it is the shudder that captures the ordinary reader; in fact, the majority of readers.

Poems that wait for an angel tongue,
Songs that but long for a Paradise bird."

Everything may be made interesting by its becoming a subject of thought or inquiry. Books, regarded merely as a gratification, are worth more than all the luxuries on earth. A taste for literature secures cheerful occupation for the unemployed and languid hours of life.

Sir Edwin Arnold has published a poem in which he makes the statement that "Love builds on the azure sea and love builds on the golden strand." Strangely enough, he overlooks the fact that love frequently builds a cottage on real estate purchased on time and invariably regrets it.

The line "Though lost to sight to memory dear" has never been placed, in spite of the most persistent research. It was no doubt the title of a ballad, or a pleasing line in it, but the name of the author remains unknown. It has been stated that it was found engraved upon a bracelet fashioned in the seventeenth century.

There is an interesting example of heredity in the case of Mrs. Harriette R. Shattuck, daughter of William S. Robinson, the old-time political writer. Mr. Robinson was in his day one of the shrewdest politicians in New England, and his daughter has a wide and accurate knowledge of parliamentary law, on which she has written a book for the use of women.

The noted Epworth Bible excited great interest among the delegates to the Methodist council in Washington. Instead of the usual pulpit volume, sumptuously bound in velvet or embossed leather, it was covered with coarse, stout canvas, with no clasps. But the print was as good as when the father of the famous founder of Methodism read the lessons from it at Epworth.

As leader of the House of Commons, the late William Henry Smith, won the respect of all parties. His answers to the brilliant and sarcastic eloquence of the government's opponents were always suave and soft, and often acted as a sedative when the house was excited. He was most given to the use of proverbial quotations, which led Punch years ago to give him the title of "Old Morality."

Bernhard Quaritch, the best-known bookseller in London, if not in the world, finds himself practically a bankrupt in his old age. His establishment in Piccadilly is mortgaged to the extent of $500,000. "Don't congratulate me on these beautiful things," said he, bitterly, to a visitor last summer; "they are not mine. The whole place is mortgaged. I exist only by the friendly toleration of another."

Judge Goodwin has written an interesting volume of reminiscences and sketches of the palmy days on the Comstock, which is now in press, under the title of the "Comstock Club." The advance sheets show that the work is in his happiest vein, and it will be read with interest by the old '49ers, Argonauts and other folks. The mystery is how and when does the judge find the time to write a book in addition to his ordinary duties.

Thomas Hardy, the novelist, began his career as an architect in English Dorchester, and his first published work was an essay on the use of colored brick and terra cotta in dwelling houses. His first novel, "Desperate Remedies," was published in 1870, when he was 31 years old. He is, therefore, 52 years old at present, or two years younger than William Dean Howells. His latest book was "A Group of Noble Dames" and has been very well noticed in the leading reviews. He is one of the English authors whom foreign visitors seldom see, not being over fond of society.

Tolstoi has issued the following proclamation regarding publication of his works: "Owing to numerous requests for authorization to publish, translate or play my works, I beg you to publish in your paper the following declaration: I give everyone, gratuitously, the right to publish in Russia and abroad, either in Russian or a foreign tongue, all my works written since 1881 and published in volume XII of the complete edition of my works, which appeared in 1886, as likewise in volume XIII, which appeared this year, and all my works published in Russia, as well as those which shall appear after the aforesaid date."

Fashion smiles at him a little for these eccentricities, but that does not prevent him from being the most popular official in Washington.

A vestryman in a London church complained the other day that he had been called a maw-worm, a Pangloss and a Chadband. "I find the word 'maw-worm' defined in the dictionaries," said he, "but I cannot discover what is meant by 'Pangloss' and 'Chadband.'" We do not wonder. There is, of course, but one Chadband in literature, but Pangloss is more numerous. How few people there are who have read "Candido." Yet John Morley has given the English-reading public a very clever edition of the translated satire, and the joke of it all is that he has coupled with this spicy screed that curious, romantic homily "Rasselas."—Chicago News.

"Just after the battle of Shiloh," said General W. T. Clark, of Denver, to a Chicago Post reporter, "General Grant issued orders that no whisky should be brought into camp. The enforcement of the order worked great hardship to many of the 'boys.' One of the worst sufferers was Colonel Doran, of the 'Fighting Irish' Seventeenth Wisconsin. Not much behind him in love of the ardent was Colonel Van Horn, of a Missouri regiment. These two would meet and console each other over the terrible straits to which they were reduced. In Van Horn's regiment was a dare-devil fellow named Mike Hennessey. At Van Horn's suggestion, Hennessey searched for, found and brought into camp a keg of choice Bourbon. That morning Van Horn went to Doran's tent. 'Good morning, Colonel Doran,' said he. 'Good morning,' growled the Irish regiment's commander, without looking up. 'Nice morning, Colonel Doran,' said Van Horn, in a most conciliatory tone. 'No, it isn't a nice morning,' snarled Doran. 'Colonel Doran,' whispered the other, 'Mike Hennessey brought a keg of fine whisky into camp last night, and—I—have—brought—a—canteen full—of—it—to—you!' 'Glory be to Peter! Colonel; do my ears deceive me, or do I hear the angels singing?' cried Doran, in ecstasy. And once again all was joy with the two colonels."

The arbitrary course of Judge Wallace in the endeavor to secure juries, both grand and petit, to render verdicts in accord with his notion, recalls an incident in the trial of William Penn in 1670: He was arraigned for having spoken at a Quaker meeting. Amid angry exclamations and menaces, he proceeded to plead earnestly for the fundamental laws of England; and as he was hurried out of court, still reminded the jury that "they were his judges." Dissatisfied with the first verdict returned, the recorder heaped upon the jury every opprobrious epithet. "We will have a verdict by the help of God, or you shall starve for it." "You are Englishmen," said Penn, who had again been brought to the bar; "mind your privilege, give not away your right." At last the jury, who had received no refreshments for two days and two nights, on the third day gave their verdict: "Not guilty." The recorder fined them forty marks apiece for their independence. Another illustration might be given in the case of Cardinal Wolsey: Under Cromwell the coercion of juries and the management of judges rendered the courts mere mouthpieces of the royal will; and where even the shadow of justice proved an obstacle to bloodshed, Parliament was brought into play to pass bill after bill of attainder. "He shall be judged by the bloody laws he has himself made," was the cry of the council at the moment of his fall, and by a singular retribution the crowning injustice which he sought to introduce even into the practice of attainder—the condemnation of a man without hearing his defence—was only practised on himself.

Woman's nature being so much more exuberant than that of man, there is more danger, frequently, in success than in defeat. If a woman loses her money repeatedly on a venture, it is her make-up to become superstitious and avoid the shoals. Victory entices her to the verge of foolhardiness.

The Chinese are very particular about lucky and unlucky colors. It is whispered in Berlin society that a certain elderly German prince, whose name has not yet been printed in the papers, has been wheedled by a woman who figured as a Belgian actress, but who was in reality a French spy. The prince was dumbfounded, and made confession to the Emperor, who was furious, and ordered his arrest and confinement in a fortress.

No vegetable has undergone a greater development in the last generation than the tomato. Persons who still esteem themselves young well remember the time when the only tomatoes to be seen were the small round or oval ones called love apples and deemed inedible. They seem to have been appropriated for table use first in this country, for an old European traveler tells how he astonished his fellow-diners at a continental table d'hôte by eating the tomatoes placed on the table purely as garniture.

A sensible preacher gave utterance to the following sentiment: "I hate to hear one occupying a mansion and dressed in fine clothes eulogize poverty. When I hear a man talk of destitution being a blessing I wonder how miserably he must have used his riches, if he ever had any. When I hear one say that sickness has been a profit I wonder how he used his health. Many persons would be better Christians and better citizens if they were not subjected to privations and struggles for food and clothing for wife and children. Poverty dwarfs their conscience and holds out temptation to lie and steal and go to the bottom."

The numerous cases of robbery by degraded women that have transpired in this city of late, suggest there should be a resort to the policy we have so often suggested: close up the dives and rigidly enforce the vagrancy law. The municipality has ample power to protect its people, and to rid itself of elements that are a menace to good order. While no sympathy is deserved by men who will visit low haunts and lose their money, consideration should be had for the credit of the city.

The two greatest and most powerful daily evening journals in the United States are published right here in Sacramento; at least, this community is so informed nearly every day through the columns of the Bee and News. Sacramento's future prosperity and the bonded-debt question appear to have dropped entirely out of sight of even "Me and Drury," while their esteemed contemporaries are continually booming themselves as the true and tried friend of the good people of Sacramento. These two great and powerful dailies should put a stop to their petty quarrels and confine their editorial columns to the two important questions, which of all others at present most affect the welfare of our city, namely: the bonded debt and the adoption of a new charter. Acting as referee, THEMIS declares your fight a draw, and hopes that in the future you will refrain from indulging in any more wordy encounters, which are uninteresting to the reader and unbecoming a journalist.

California Pioneers Reunion.

NEW YORK, October 27, 1891.

EDITOR THEMIS: Last evening a party of hale, hearty gentlemen, but with grizzly-gray beards and hair, sat down to dinner at Morelo's, to celebrate the forty-third anniversary of the discharge of Col. Jonathan D. Stevenson's New York Volunteers from service in California (1848), and each one of the party were survivors of that old command—the company restricted as it was to former comrades, could not at this late date be large—those present were Francis D. Clark, Co. D, President; John H. Welch, Co. E, Treasurer; Joseph Evans, Co. I, Secretary; James E. Nuttman, Co. B; Russell Myers, Co. A; William H. Rogers, Co. A; William H. Williams, Co. A; George Van Vechten, Co. H; Jacob W. Norris, Co. D; Jacob J. Schoonmaker, Co. A; Charles J. McPherson, Co. B.

The Secretary of the Society read letters from Col. J. D. Stevenson, Capt. Francis J. Lippitt, Co. F; Lieutenants Thos. E. Ketchum, Co. B; George D. Brewerton, Co. C, and Theron R. Perlee, Co. C. Privates, E. D. Shirland, Co. G; James A. Tait, Co. A; August Ehlers, Co. A; Patrick Lynch, Co. B; Emil A. Engelberg, Co. F; James Harron, Co. D; James Lynch, Co. F; Adolph G. Russ, Co. G; Castor Briggs, Co. E; Calvin Hitt, Co. I, and James C. L. Wadsworth, Esq., the sutler's clerk.

President Clark announced the death of three comrades since the last annual dinner. Joshua S. Vincent, Co. I; Daniel Frink, Co. K, and William Luker, Co. I. The death of August Ehlers, of Co. A, had been reported, but his letter was proof to the contrary.

Treasurer Welch reported a good balance in the treasury. During the evening the old officers of the society were reelected.

A more agreeable and pleasant evening than these old pioneers to California in 1847 passed it would be hard to imagine—all had the appearance of well-to-do citizens. The health of the absent but living comrades were drunk in the pure wines of Californian vintage, as well as a silent toast to the memory of those who had answered their last roll-call.

It Takes a Woman—

To make a little go a great way;
To make a man of a foolish boy;
To understand a baby's prattling;
To make a wise man turn foolish;
To interpret a man's unspoken thoughts;
To buy that dear little cup and saucer when she really meant to buy a pair of gloves;

To entertain a crowd of people smilingly when her head feels as if a hundred little demons were hammering it;

To make a bonnet out of last year's hat, to hunt in her old hats for the name of a well known importer, to sew it in her bonnet and wear it as the latest importation.

Jeweled Gloves.

Gloves were formerly much more valuable than they are now; at least they were formerly more expensively ornamented than now. They were, in 1416, often set with precious stones and sufficiently valuable to be left as legacies. The jeweled gloves of St. Martial were said to have rebuked an act of sacrilege. The gloves of Bishop Gravesend, worked with gold and enamel, were priced at £5, a great sum in 1310. But the sturdier Bishop Button wore thick yellow gloves at 10 pence a pair.

The Funny Man in Heaven.

Once a mortal passed the skies and found the gates of Paradise—a door of agate, sapphire, beryl, diamond, ruby, opal, pearl, that burned a million beams of light full on his wavering earthborn sight; while towering up high over all, he saw the gleaming jasper wall.

With trembling hand he rang the bell, and heard the sound through Eden swell to die away among the trees, in lowest, sweetest melodies; the jeweled door was backward rolled, he trod at last the pave of gold.

Ah, never yet hath eye been turned upon the scene that 'round him burned! A city, pillared, domed and fair, seemed builded on the very air; and crystal glories, wave on wave, swept up the lofty architrave; from basement stone to farther height, blazed full the fires of Infinite. No earthly ear, no earthly tongue, hath ever heard, hath ever sung—no earthly mind hath ever known the mellow cadence of the tone—the song each harping angel sings along the burning, golden strings. 'Tis only in the wildest dream our senses catch the faintest gleam—'tis only with the inner eyes one looks upon far Paradise.

"What wouldst thou here?" Saint Peter said, "thy human part as yet undead. Knowest thou not it's many a day since souls came up encased in clay? Enoch was first, Elijah last, who through these doors undying passed; and who are you who seems to be mortal in immortality."

"Most Holy Saint," the man replied, "'tis very true I never died. I never met that triple doom, the shroud, the coffin and the tomb. Tho' deathless yet I stand serene, a dozen living deaths I've seen. Father, in Gennesaret you often dragged an empty net; fished through all the dismal night and never got a single bite. You've known the grip of poverty—a preacher out in Galilee; and what life means to people that live by 'passing around the hat.' Pardon, Father, not in mirth I speak again of things of earth. Your earthly light went out in gloom, by violence you found a tomb, but you've ne'er felt, you ne'er can know the troubles now in vogue below."

"I was a Funny Writer—life to me was one long dreary strife. To tell you half my misery would take 'bout all eternity. Excuse my tongue's extravagance, but know the breadth of Time's expanse could not contain, tho' detailed brief, the filled-up measure of my grief. Through winter's storm and summer's sun I've chased a very rocky pun; in winter's fog and summer's smoke I wrestled with a shady joke, the very record of my days is written down in paraphrase. My life, my soul is sore oppressed; I rise to thee for peace and rest. Leading the painful life I've led, death must himself to me be dead. This must be so else how have I passed out of time and yet not die?"

"Mortal, since you hither came I've searched the page that bears your name and find recorded there no ill—to your account no unpaid bill. Yet it is strange that up through death you walked and never lost your breath. Your lot, although you didn't die, was sad enough—come up on high."

A Weary Memory.

Memory is often a good test of age. When a person begins to find the recollection of current and recent work failing, and when he finds the recollection of events of the early part of his life acutely perceptible, and by a kind of spontaneity recurrent, the evidence is certain that the mind of that person is aging. The fact is still further emphasized if, with the remembrance of past days, there is some pathetic response calling forth a sentimental feeling either of pleasure or of pain. There probably is a physiological reason for these phenomena. In early life certain centers of the brain are filled with impressions and images which have become fixed, and for a time quiescent. They sleep. While they sleep other parts of the brain are charged with new impressions, which remain in activity, provoking the physical body into new and continued actions, and constituting the life of the individual as it is seen at work; nay, as it really is. But time goes on, and under the active life the brain centers receiving the later impressions tire, wear out, and for working purposes suspend function and die. Their suspension is not, however, the suspension of the whole of the cerebral organism. The parts first impressed and imprinted—the parts that carry the latent impressions—remain intact, and no longer oppressed and obscured by that which has accumulated upon them begin once more to live and display their activities. So aged people who forget the names of those who are staring them in the face, who forget the details of the last ride, or walk, or work, and who forget engagements, letters, and hours of meals, remember with the freshness of their youth, the places, habits, conversations, events that have long since passed, and have been so long in oblivion.

And soul-tormenting freaks,

The worst is the man who sits and rocks

In a rocking chair that squeaks.

Retrospection.

I stand once more in Times old withered ways,
Among the dead Decembers and dead Mays--
To me redrawn the faded yesterdays.

The sweet white daisies dot the grassy hill;
The blue-bell's chime comes ringing to me still;
The buttercups dip to the passing rill.

I hear the cows low by the riverside;
The pettish lambs cry in the meadows wide;
The birds call as they did ere mother died.

Out in the clover beds the bee soughs sound;
The mown blooms shed their dying odors round;
The plum tree's petaled snow falls to the ground.

The sweet day swims between the earth and sky;
Soft through the bending wheat the south winds sigh;
Across the mountain tops the cloudlets fly.

The bright, warm sunshine pours into the room
Where mother sang away my childish gloom,
Before she stole hence to the soulless tomb.

Sometimes we hear old notes harped back in dreams;
Sometimes, in sleep, we catch the starlike gleams
Of light along fair Eden's streams.

I only dream! Back comes no past—no tone!
There is no past—it has forever flown!
No songs—dead songs are not! I am alone.

I am alone. Like one who thinks he hears
A long-unheard, a long-stilled voice, my tears
Fall on the close-sealed grave of sleeping years.

Since mother died the long days longer grow,
The bitter nights drag on their sad hours so—
Time's dreary, dreary tide has run out slow.

An Anecdote of Carlyle.

Mr. Robert Harrison, who has been librarian of the London library for more than thirty-four years, in the course of his presidential address at the recent librarians' conference at Nottingham gave some interesting reminiscences of Carlyle and other eminent men who were accustomed to frequent the library. The most conspicuously original man among them was Carlyle. He often visited the library. His conversation was most amusing, full of exaggerated statements, and always ending with a loud laugh, apparently at himself.

He used the library books extensively for his later works, and was guilty of the reprehensible practice of writing on the margins of their books. We must admit that his remarks were never meaningless, but chiefly consisted of corrections of dates or errors in the text. One remark of his, however, which was pretty well known, was a criticism. It occurred in Charles Diddin's collection of songs, the last page of which contained the ordinary version of "Rule Britannia." At the foot of this boastful song Carlyle had written "Cock-a-doodle-do," with a small forest of notes of exclamation after it. In a case like that the librarian would be a martinet indeed if he had effaced from the book an expression so characteristic of the man of genius who wrote it.

He hoped they would pardon him for thus dwelling a few moments on the name of Carlyle, if for the sake of his pregnant saying so interesting to them all: "Why is there not a majesty's library in every county town? There is a majesty's jail and gallows in every one." Of Thackeray, another eminent member of the London library, he had an anecdote, which they probably had heard before. When writing "The Virginians," he came to him (the speaker) for a life of Gen. Wolfe. "I don't want," he said, "a historical account of his career, Lord Mahon's book gives me that, but I want something that will tell me the color of his breeches." He had the pleasure also of helping Charles Reade to find materials for his splendid story of "The Cloister and the Hearth."

The late Lord Lytton was a frequent visitor and inquirer, as was also the author of "Westward Ho!" and the great novelist known by the name of George Eliot. He was quite astonished at first to see what pains and research were applied to the production of books so easy to read as were their best novels. An illustrious living member of the London library, Mr. Gladstone, had always taken an interest in their prosperity, and had often given them his valuable support at their meetings. He made use chiefly of their works of reference.

He remembered with pleasure a small incident that occurred when "Juventus Mundi" was going to the press. Mr. Gladstone called to verify a line in Propertius or Ausonius, he forgot which. He told his need to one of the masters who happened to be present. The line was found and it differed slightly from that which Mr. Gladstone had quoted. "But," said the Eton master to him afterward, "his line was much finer than the one which we found in print."

Nobody has been able to throw any light on the word "cat." It is common European of unknown origin. In all the modern languages the word is found as far back as they will go. Byzantine Greek had katta, and the Latin of Martial catta. The name was probably imported with the animal, and the animal probably came to Europe from Egypt, though it is singular that the original word should be so extensively found in all the Romance, Teutonic, and Celtic languages.

A Pioneer Walnut Tree.

For many, many years the large black-walnut tree on the edge of the sidewalk in front of the Hatch property on H street, between Eighth and Ninth, has been a prominent landmark in the city. Perhaps it was the oldest and largest tree in Sacramento. In 1859 the late Dr. F. W. Hatch planted, with his own hands, three black-walnut trees in front of his residence. Two died and the one we speak of, the third, flourished. It was cut down this week, and the diameter of the stump was found by measurement to be forty-six inches. The rings corresponded with its known age.

The object of the lecture merits an overflowing audience.

Very Polite.

"Is this Ned Phillpot?" the justice asked, addressing a little nappy-headed negro.
 "Yes, sah, thankee, ef you please."
 "Been drunk again?"
 "Yes, sah, thankee."
 "Been here some ten times within the past year, haven't you?"
 "Yes, sah, thank you, 'bleeged to you."
 "When are you going to quit?"
 "Doan' know, thankee, sah."
 "I believe I'll send you to the work-house for twenty-five days."
 "Thankee, sah."
 "Look here, what makes you so polite?"
 "Kain't he'p it, sah; bo'n in me, sah, I reckens."
 "Well, I think I'll let you off this time. Politeness ought to be rewarded."
 "'Bleeged to you, sah; thankee."
 When the little old negro was gone, the justice said: "There can't help but be some little good in so polite a man. He may be a drunkard, but—but—"
 "What are you looking for, judge?" some one asked.
 "Why, that red silk handkerchief; it was lying on this desk a moment ago."

"Doing" Palestine.

A woman who has been to Europe says an opportunity is never lost to gibe the meteoric flight of the "tourist." She heard a story of two young men doing Palestine. They drove to the pool of Bethesda, and as they descended from the carriage the guide said: "This is the pool of Bethesda."
 "Ah," commented one of them, "pool of Bethesda. Chalk it down, Gus; we've seen the pool of Bethesda. "By the way, guide," as he dived into the carriage, "who was Bethesda?"—New York Times.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Goodyear, Elritch and Schilling Minstrels will be with us on Friday and Saturday, November 13th and 14th. There has been a long vacation in the dramatic line in this city. The lovers of dramatic entertainment are hungry for a good show.

C. P. Hall, the late manager of the Metropolitan and Clunie, has been confined to his bed for a long time by reason of an injury in the railroad accident recently on the Benecia route. We are pleased that he has so far recovered as to be able to be upon the streets.

THE SKELETON BRIDE.

A crowd of half-drunken students returning from a nightly revel in the town of Göttingen paused beneath a curtained window. One of them, observing a light was burning, murmured:

"A curse upon the head behind that light!"
 "Are you mad?" cried his companion.
 "That is Carl's window. No doubt he is chatting with his pretty bride. Happy fellow."

"A curse upon them both!" replied Victor, who had spoken first. "I loved them both once, till Heidele stole her away from me. I wish my sword had pierced his heart."

"What!" exclaimed one of the others, "have you and Carl crossed blades?"
 "Was she not worth fighting for?" sneered Victor. "I spared him. More fool I."

The others laughed mockingly. The watch at that moment interfered and ordered them to disperse. They obeyed and the street again became silent and deserted.

A few days previous to this midnight revel Carl Heidele had brought his youthful bride to his humble home. His generous heart throbbed fast, and his manly cheek glowed warm, as he gazed upon her sweet face and fair form.

Minna had just completed her eighteenth year. Brown, wavy hair shaded her smooth brow, and the azure light of heaven dwelt within her eyes. Her beauty had made her known to many in the city. But when she heard that reckless wooers had crossed swords and shed blood with her name upon their lips, then came a tinge of sorrow to dwell upon her sweet face.

Now, however, Carl's love chased every trace of grief away. Their hearts were bound together by the tenderest, purest affection.

The death of a distant relative called Carl from Minna's side. It was the first separation and brought tears to her bright eyes. She followed him to the door, clinging fondly and closely to his arm. He spoke to her cheerily and bade her be happy without him for a few hours.

"Oh, Carl," replied the gentle Minna, "this will be a long, weary day without you."

Carl smiled sadly and pressed his lips upon her pale brow.

"Come, Minna," he answered laughingly, "dry your tears and go change this dark-colored dress. You know my favorite, the present from your father—white and blue."

Carl bounded away and Minna slowly retraced her steps to her room. All that day a weight of leaden grief hung upon her heart. Her books and embroidery were thrown aside. There was nothing that could slant out gloomy thoughts from her mind. Night came at last. Meantime Carl had reached his destination, accomplished his design, and was hurrying back to his home and bride. As the horses toiled slowly up the hills he grew impatient, alighted from the coach and walked on ahead, lost in gloomy reverie. At last the dingy spires of the city churches caught his anxious eye. They seemed like black fingers pointing up at the stars.

"How late it is," he murmured, as the deep tones of the watchman's horn fell upon his ears. "Poor child! she'll be asleep."

With throbbing heart he bounded up the broad stairway, calling:

"Minna! Minna!"

"God keep our land from fire and brand," cried the watchman under the window. The sash rattled and stairs creaked; then all was still again.

"Minna! Minna!" repeated Carl in a loud and trembling voice, as he burst into the room. "I'm back again, Minna. Where are you?"

A lamp was burning upon the window sill. The coverlets were tossed here and there. A pistol lay upon the table. Carl reeled against the wall. An agonizing presentiment flashed through his mind. But catching a glimpse of the white and blue dress upon the sofa, he sprang wildly and joyfully forward and threw himself upon his knees, as he was wont to do.

"Oh, God!" he screamed, starting back, mad with sickening fear, for he had clasped two fleshless hands and arms between his own. They were covered with Minna's rings and bracelets.

Carl raised his eyes to look for his bride's sweet face, but a ghastly, grinning skull was there, with ear rings glittering upon it which Minna had received as a bridal present. The scraggy bones of the skeleton's neck and shoulders protruded through the beautiful dress he had expected to find upon Minna's fair form.

"They've murdered her! they've murdered her!" groaned the wretched man. A shudder convulsed his frame. He strove to regain his feet, staggered and fell to the floor a corpse, his life blood issuing from mouth and nostrils.

The noise of the fall aroused the sleeping Minna, whom the fiendish skill of Victor had drugged and removed to an adjoining room. Her reason fled at the sight of Carl bleeding at the feet of the hideous "Skeleton Bride." She threw herself upon his body and clasped his livid face to her bosom in agony of grief. Thus their neighbors found them. Minna was torn from her husband's cold form, and in a few short weeks they laid her at his side in the silent churchyard.

To this day that house is called the "House of the Skeleton Bride;" and as the school children pass through the street they often look up at the window and murmur "Poor Minna Heidele."

Torturing the Poor Hog.

The pepsin sold in the drug stores is the veritable product of an animal stomach, and generally of the stomach of the hog. One factory in New York has the oddest method of preparing the article that ever entered into the human mind. A number of perfectly healthy hogs are fattened for market, and for thirty-six hours before killing time are deprived of all food, not even being allowed a drop of water. Then the trough from which they have been accustomed to eat is covered with strong wire netting and the most appetizing slops and hog delicacies, smoking hot, are poured into the trough. The fumes ascend with grateful fragrance to the porcine nostrils, the hogs all run to the trough and stand over it, ravenous with hunger, squealing and fighting with each other for a chance to get at the slops. The iron netting prevents them from tasting the food, and while they are still thinking about the matter they are killed, and their stomachs being taken out are found perfectly full of gastric juice, from which the pepsin is prepared. Now, if it was not the hog's imagination that made the gastric juice flow into his stomach in anticipation of a feast, what was it?—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Is Kissing Dangerous?

Some German physician who is evidently an old and weakened person is responsible for again bringing to notice the theory that kissing is a dangerous practice. After several years' study of bacteria he is convinced that osculation is a prolific factor of disease; that all sorts of troubles are conveyed through this enjoyable performance, and that the rapturous quarter of an hour in which a young man delays his fond adieu to his sweetheart is full of appalling possibilities which menace the happiness of the human race.

It is strongly suspected that the German doctor is croaking over sour grapes. He is probably too distempered, too old and hoary, too uncomely and bald ever to be kissed by any one of the fair daughters of Eve; and, like the tailless fox who wanted all the other foxes to amputate their tails, too, he would deprive his fellow-men of a delight in which he cannot participate.

RUGGLES AND THE CHARCAT.

When Ruggles left the country town which had given him birth and went to London to improve his position, it was held that he had done a great deed and had even greater things in prospect. He had been the center of an admiring circle, composed principally of two maiden aunts and a privileged servitor, but local enthusiasm reached its height when he resigned his appointment as foreman in a bootmaker's shop and took up an agency for patent paper shoe soles. He himself was pre-empted with a sense of enterprise, and it was long before he could pass the bright gold letters which were placed above his door to herald a career of fame without almost painful thrills of exultation. The chambers in which he had taken up his residence were situated in a crowded part of the city, but no one else had to climb so high as the top floor; he reigned there alone, feeling supreme in his importance, and proud in the possession of a small round window which looked through a gap between two higher buildings, straight into the sky. The flights of stairs, which had at first seemed a drawback to the situation, proved after all to be no insurmountable objection. As a matter of fact, he only descended and ascended them twice a day for meals; never leaving his room during business hours, in case any one should call. No one ever did call, however; no living soul came onto the landing where he lived, so far as he saw, though the boots he put out at night were replaced in a satisfactory state of shininess, with a can of hot water in the morning, and though hasty cleanings and "clearings up" must have taken place during his short absences. After a while, when all his circulars were written—as many as he could afford to stamp—a sense of loneliness grew upon Ruggles and became almost intolerable at last. One day a bell which he had never noticed before, though it had hung opposite to him for six months, suddenly impressed itself upon his vision, and he wondered with an intensity more than adequate to the occasion what would happen if he rang it. Would any one come? It was a problem he felt impelled to solve, though he lacked courage to put it practically to the proof, and by a coincidence of events an opportunity of acquiring the desired knowledge presented itself that very evening as he was going out. A door on a lower landing stood ajar, and a man inside was gathering up his papers with a view to departure.

Ruggles stood on the threshold, hesitating. "I beg your pardon, but can you tell me if your bell rings?" he asked at last.

"Don't know, I'm sure. I have not tried it for five years."

"And then," with a feverish moistening of his lips.

"Nobody came. The charwoman had died in the night. That was the reason my boots and hot water had not come up to time. Fine evening?"

"It may be," returned Ruggles, and passed on his way out into the sunshine which he never saw, and through the fresh air which had no power to blow the cobwebs from his brain.

After that day he was never alone again. His bare walls became peopled with ill-visaged elfin creatures that ran up his window blinds and peered at him from behind the doors or through the bars of his empty grate. And there was no longer any silence, for his head was full now of loud buzzings, above which he heard at times more unfamiliar noises, and his name called in tones that he had not known before. He might close his eyes and ears but he could not shut out sight and sound; and the round window, whose light fell on his table, was like a great mocking eye which saw the anguish of his soul and was unsatisfied.

At last came a temporary reprieve. As Ruggles walked up and down his room one night in dressing-gown and slippers something came behind him, and looking over his shoulder nervously, he saw that it was a little black kitten playing with the tassels of his waist girdle that hung behind him on the floor. She patted them first with one paw then with another, and as Ruggles stopped to watch her gambols she rolled over with them in an ecstasy of delight. It was only the charwoman's cat, a half-starved, wretched animal, which had strayed upward in search of food, and had been beguiled into momentary forgetfulness of her wants; but to Ruggles it meant companionship, and that was salvation. From that time he used every effort to lure the cat to his rooms; and she, conscious that her lines had fallen at last into pleasant places, was not loath to be so lured. She was black with her own blackness and another outside blackness which she had contracted in coal cellars and odd corners underneath the stairs; yet Ruggles allowed her to lie on his bed, where she left distinct "forms" on the white counterpane that his maiden aunts had instructed him should only need washing once a year, and suffered her to drink over night the milk that he had brought in for his morning tea. For while she was there he could speak and hear his own voice, and his room was untenanted save for himself and his providentially-arrived companion. So the char-cat thrived and prospered.

But a day came when Ruggles watched the door of his room in vain, and waited through the long uneventful hours with the odds and ends of meat that he had brought in with him from a neighboring restaurant, equally to no purpose. Night came, but the charcat was still absent, and with his loneliness all the old horrors returned, intensified by fears which had meanwhile grown in his mind concerning their origin and tendency. Toward the middle of the next day he penetrated to the dark regions under ground, where the charwoman in charge of the chambers was supposed to have her dwelling place. As his feet left the last stair and came on to the stone basement with a hollow reverberating echo, a woman emerged from the shadow of an arched doorway and stood in a defiant attitude, as though challenging his approach.

"I came to ask about the cat," said Ruggles.

"Then you needn't ask here; No. 45 settled her yesterday—threw a boot at her head—and a good job, too. She was skeered of a rat and never earned her wittles."

"Is she—dead?" was asked in hushed tones that would have been appropriate to a cathedral aisle, or might have been used by a widowed mother dreading the loss of her only child.

But the woman never heard. The darkness had once more swallowed her up; and this, with the heavy solitude, became so alarming to Ruggles that he turned hastily and went back, quickening his pace to a run as the sound of his own footsteps pursued and appeared to catch him up. He had no definite idea in his mind; it was that terrible agency called chance that brought him to a standstill, panting and exhausted, before a door that bore above it the number 45; and on impulse, as sudden as it was disastrous, he pushed it open and walked in without any knock as an announcement.

"The char cat"—he stammered out; then brought to a quick perception of the effect that his appearance might have upon a stranger, he tightened the girdle of his shabby dressing-gown and smoothed his thin, straggling locks. "I live on the top floor," he explained. "My name is Ruggles—James Ruggles, and I came to ask about a cat—the charwoman's cat."

"If you mean the little black devil that played about the stairs and turned over and broke my milk jug yesterday?"

"Yes!" breathed Ruggles breathlessly.

"Well, she won't trouble either of us any more."

"Is she—dead?"

"As a door nail," cheerfully.

"You—you killed her—you?"

A sudden red gleam shooting from Ruggles' weak eyes and a quick gathering together of his limbs as a tiger preparing for a spring warned the other of his danger, he had clashed the bell with all his might and shouted out a loud cry for help before Ruggles was upon him, struggling with maniacal strength to get his lean fingers round his throat.

It was all over in a few seconds. Half a dozen men had rushed to the rescue, and Ruggles, overpowered, lay on the ground in a fit and foaming at the mouth. But what had prompted this mad attack on a man he had not seen before, a man who could never have wrought him any wrong, is still a mystery.

Superstitions About Birds.

In many parts of Saxony the peasants will not raise chickens, even though they could double their investment many fold. They call the male of the barnyard fowl the "bird of ill-omen," from a notion that he "crowed for joy" at the time of the crucifixion.

The majority of sailors on the Atlantic ocean religiously believe that the frigate bird can start at daybreak, with the trade winds, from the coast of Africa and roost the same night upon the American coast. Ornithologists say that under favorable conditions the frigate bird will make 200 miles an hour.

In Sweden the turtle dove is looked upon as sacred. The Swedes call it "God's bird" and "Noah's bird," from a notion that it is the same species of bird that the commander of the ark sent out to bring back tidings of a receding flood.

In France the quail is called the "Bird of Prophecy;" this from an idea that the number of his calls foretells the price of wheat. If he calls twice without resting, the farmers expect but two francs per bushel for their grain; if the bird calls four times, they expect to realize twice the price which two calls insure. In olden times a bird called a "phoenix" was thought to live in the deserts of Arabia. His lease of life was said to be 500 years, at the end of which time he built a nest of spices and fanned it into a flame with his wings. The flame reduced the bird to ashes, out of which he sprang to live another 500 years. Richardson says that he had fifty orifices in his beak, through which he sung melodious airs.

The raven was also one of the chosen birds of mediæval superstition. Knapp calls him—

The hateful messenger of heavy things.
Of death and dolor telling.

Dayton speaks of—

The greedy raven that doth call for death.

Until Death.

"Will you wait for me? Will you be faithful?"

"I will wait for you, and I will be faithful."

"Until death?"

"Until death!"

In the shadow of a grand old southern home with the scent of magnolia blooms around them, two young lovers met to say good-bye. The time was May, 1861.

Three months before Bernard Awtry, a young engineer from Maine, had gone down to Louisiana to work at his profession. There he met and loved Ethel Wayne. His love was returned, but the young lovers' dreams of happiness were rudely disturbed by the alarm of war. Circumstances prevented their marriage at that time, and there was nothing left them but separation.

The call for men to save the union had been made. Bernard Awtry heard the call, and he loved his country too well to forget his duty. Ethel Wayne's sympathy was with the cause of the south, but she loved Bernard Awtry none the less because he was true to his country.

"I will wait for you until the war is over and then you will come back," she said.

"And you will be true to me?" he pleaded.

"Yes; I will be true until death!"

And so they parted while the night wind laden with the odor of flowers sang to the pines in a soft lullaby, "I will be true until death."

Near the close of one of the great battles of the civil war a captain in the union army was borne into a field hospital and tenderly laid on one of the rude couches. Blood was flowing from a terrible wound in his head.

The surgeons came to him after a long time. He looked at them and tried to speak, but they could only catch three words. Passing his hand over his eyes as if something obstructed his vision, he muttered feebly: "Ethel!—until death."

Hastily the surgeons examined the wound and then they shook their heads.

"He may recover," they said, "but his memory will be impaired."

A man whose step was slow and feeble and whose hair was prematurely gray, one day attempted to cross one of the crowded business streets of New York. There was a warning shout from the driver of a heavily laden truck, a cry of horror from the spectators, but the warning was too late. The man fell and in a moment he was terribly crushed by the wheels of the truck.

Gently he was laid out on a cot at the nearest hospital, but when the doctors looked at his mangled limbs they shook their heads and turned away. He was already dying.

A nurse, whose sad sweet face told of some great sorrow suffered in silence, was passing through the ward. She saw the dying man lying on the cot. The thin, wan face of the sufferer lighted up with something akin to pleasure at the approach of death.

With a startled cry the nurse sprang to the side of the cot and threw her arms around the neck of the dying man.

A smile came to his lips and above the death rattle in his throat the nurse heard him whisper: "Ethel, you have been faithful."

As her trembling fingers closed the sightless eyes, she kissed the pale, cold lips and whispered: "Until death."

A Chapter on Ghosts.

The dread of ghosts, so well known to all uncivilized and semi-uncivilized countries, is common in the aborigines of India to an unusual degree; the same may be said of their Aryau conquerors and the lower classes of Mohammedans. All Indian ghosts are supposed to be mischievous, and some of them bitterly malicious. The only means employed to appease the rancor of these unlaidd spirits is to build shrines for them and to make them offerings, such as a fowl, a pig, and, on grand occasions, a buffalo. Any severe illness, and more especially any epidemic disease, such as small pox or cholera, is attributed to the malignancy of certain of these spirits, which must be propitiated accordingly.

The "man-tiger" is, perhaps the most dreaded of all the Indian demon-ghosts; for, when a tiger has killed a man, the tiger itself is considered safe from harm, the spirit of the man being supposed to ride upon the beast's head and guide him clear of all danger. Accordingly, it is believed that the only sure mode of destroying a tiger who has killed one or more persons is to begin by making offerings to the spirits of his victims, thereby depriving the animal of the valuable services rendered by the ghostly guides. The ghosts most propitiated are the spirits of those who have met violent deaths, whether by design or accident, including death by poison and contagious diseases. Even wretches who have been hanged for their crimes are supposed to have the same power of causing evil to the living as those who have been killed by tigers or by lightning. In parts where serpent worship is common it is considered a great honor to die from the bite of one of the poisonous creatures.

Dated October 30, 1891.

A. P. CATLIN,

W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. 031-51

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE Notice.—That on the 4th day of December, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. The Latest Vision of Jules Verne.

M. Jules Verne has been speculating as to what will be the daily life of people a thousand years hence. As science extends her dominion it is noticeable how increasingly ambitious such forecasts become. Nothing will satisfy M. Verne but aerial trains traveling at the rate of 625 miles an hour; a transatlantic tubular service, conveying the traveler from London to New York in 295 minutes; a "telephoto," which enables persons in different hemispheres to dine with each other, or at least to see and converse with each other while eating; and accumulators for condensing and radiating at will the sun's rays. Such are the advantages to be enjoyed by the inhabitants of a certain city called "Universal City," the capital of the United States in the year of grace 2891. England by that time will, according to M. Verne, have become a province of the United States. The public will be kept informed of the latest political developments, not only upon the terrestrial globe, but upon Jupiter, Mars and Venus. Not that they will read newspapers. The newspaper of the day will be spoken. Brilliant descriptive writers will be retained to speak through the telephone to millions of subscribers, and daily installments of novels, to be continued to-morrow morning, will be given by popular authors. Man is to be fed on the choicest viands, laid out as New-river water is at present, and it will be sufficient to step into a toilet cabinet to be tubbed, shaved, dressed and brushed in the space of two minutes. Even a new digestive apparatus, "warranted for two years," will be obtainable. But one thing we, or rather our posterity, are told not to expect: they must not expect to live forever. A certain Dr. Faithburn's experiment in freezing his own body and causing himself to be kept for 100 years turns out a complete failure, so obstinately does he refuse to be resuscitated.

No Strength in Drink.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, England's great temperance apostle, as well as her noted member of parliament, is given largely to anecdote in his interesting addresses. The following is extracted from an English paper: "We are getting over the absurd idea that there is any strength in drink. It is called strong drink, not because it strengthens a man, but because it is strong enough to knock him down into the gutter. I heard the other day of a doctor who recommended a patient to take some liquor."

"The patient was rather surprised and said: 'Really, doctor, do you mean to say it will enable me to get through my work better?' The doctor said: 'Oh, yes. I am a very busy man and sometimes after dinner have had letters to answer, and a pint of champagne helps me wonderfully.' The patient said: 'Does the pint of champagne really help you to answer those letters?' The doctor replied: 'No, no; when I have had a pint of champagne I don't care a rap whether I answer them or not.'"

Tobacco is a great solace for men of a profession which is so largely sedentary. If its use is wicked, everything that delights the palate or pleases the eye is wicked also. Whether it is physically injurious to the user is for him to decide by his individual experience. Morally, the practice of smoking ranks with all the luxurious habits. In truth, it has no moral quality at all, except so far as it involves self-indulgence, and public opinion does not forbid all self-indulgence to the clergy. Let the clergymen smoke, then, if they are so minded.—New York Sun.

There are two kinds of women—one kind sits and weeps silently about her wrongs and the other storms and raves about her rights.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1891.

No. 39.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The new plan. Let us see, in order to understand the new plan, what the old plan was. We have shown in previous issues of THEMIS that the old plan, followed for twelve years or more, was to make way with the enormous revenues poured into the coffers of the fund commission by buying the bonds maturing in 1898 and 1903 and allowing those maturing in 1888 and 1893 to go delinquent. We proved that this was the settled and boasted plan of the manager of the commission from his own written statements, wherein, among other delusions, he imagined that when he paid $1,000 in cash for a $1,000-bond not due until 1903, he made a clear profit of $725. Now, one of the results of this old plan, upon which some $572,600 has been squandered, is that the delinquent bonds have been greatly depreciated in the hands of the holders, and the San Francisco syndicate has picked them up at very low figures. These delinquent bonds, including those that will be delinquent in fourteen months, amounting to $581,800, exclusive of interest, are about all gathered in by the syndicate aforesaid. It has been one of the excuses frequently put forth in behalf of the old plan that it had the effect of reducing the market value of these delinquent bonds. The syndicate is waiting patiently now for the fruition of the new plan. It is waiting with a confidence, too, that has rarely been disappointed. Beatty's new plan, now that the objects of the old one have been fully realized, receives its hearty and disinterested commendation.

About the time this new plan was first conceived, Beatty, with a flourish, caused it to be announced in the Bee of April 18, 1890, that he had received a letter from San Francisco in which "Messrs. Meyer, Bates and Davis, the largest outside holders of Sacramento-city bonds, agree to such a modification of the Beatty plan for handling the debt, and loaning funds of the debt commission to the city, as will reduce the proposed yearly levy for the benefit of the commission from 35 cents to any sum not less than 20 cents." We emphasize one word in the above quotation with italics; not that it is necessary to draw attention to the authors of this scheme so vauntingly and blindly put forth as the new plan. There cannot be more than two men in this city who do not see that the president of the commission is the unwitting tool of the syndicate. One is excusable on account of his blind infatuation upon the subject; the other, because he is so ignorant upon the whole subject-matter that he can't see where the laugh comes in. Neither of them, we know full well, would promote any scheme to the disadvantage of the city, if he knew it. But that's what's the matter with the old man and his lone convert. Yet the former, amid a flood of wild notions, once in awhile distills a drop of genuine truth and wisdom. In one of his latest effusions he said: "But if we were to submit the question to the people, whether we should levy the 35-cent tax, there would be but two votes in the affirmative—Wells Drury and H. O. Beatty."

The new plan in a nut shell: Add $4,000,000 to the assessment roll. Then add 35 cents to the tax rate of $2 32 already made necessary by the greed of the syndicate, in this way grind out $200,000 per annum more from the taxpayers. For what? For whom? cui bono? Only this: to give the money to the deluded manager of the fund commission to enable him to carry on his dickerings with the syndicate on a larger scale. He now has about $100,000 per annum—which by the way he ought not to have at all. But he wants $250,000, and, as a bait for municipal gudgeons to bite at, he offers to loan the city $500,000 of the $875,000 thus raised, at five per cent interest. This scheme of robbing Peter to pay Paul would leave the city with an annual increase in its interest account of $25,000 a year, and the $500,000 in bonds would be "swapped off as soon as practicable for the old debt." All this proposed "swapping" to be conducted, of course, by the venerable manager of the fund commission, who is enthused by the delusion that "not one cent would ever have to come out of the city treasury to pay on the old debt." But the new debt, the bonds of which have been "swapped off" in the meantime to the syndicate, how is that to be paid without taxation? Right here it naturally occurs to ask how does Judge Beatty know that he can "swap" the bonds of this proposed new debt for the bonds of the old debt? He told a "Puzzled Citizen," on October 28, in the Record-Union, that "the 55 per cent. must be raised until the last dollar of the funded debt is paid." On what terms will the syndicate, whose bonds at six per cent. are worth par under a most stringent funding act which produces for the interest and sinking fund more than double the amount necessary to pay the annual interest, "swap" for five per cent. bonds unsecured by an interest and sinking fund, and dependent upon the mere pledge of a city "discredited everywhere in the civilized world, and believed by all strangers to be insolvent?"

That contract. In 1884, in the Circuit Court of the United States at San Francisco, the case of Kennedy vs. The City of Sacramento was decided in favor of the city. It was an action to recover upon interest coupons. The Court held that the funding act of 1858 was a contract between the city and its creditors, and the creditors could recover nothing except what was specifically provided for them in such contract. With regard to the right of a creditor to sue the city upon the bonds or coupons, the Court said: "This part of the contract is as important and as binding as any other. The provisions are that the city shall not be sued, and that none of its property, revenues or funds shall be taken upon any mesne or final process, and that none of the claims herein specified shall be liquidated or paid except in the manner herein provided." The fund created by the law, known as the "interest and sinking fund," provided only for the payment of the bonds and coupons, and not for any interest on the coupons. The Court concluded by saying: "The suit cannot be maintained in the face of the contract entered into, under the statute, and it is so ordered." This case is reported in 10 Sawyer U. S. Reports, page 29, and has long been known of all men except the head of the fund commission.

In 1885, in the Supreme Court of California (66 Cal. Rep., 658), the case of Davis vs. Porter, city treasurer, was decided in favor of the city. This suit was a mandamus to compel the treasurer to pay interest on past-due coupons, and the Court held, just as the circuit court had held in the Kennedy case, that the contract provided only for the annual interest, and did not provide for paying interest on interest; in other words, interest on overdue coupons. After reciting the terms of the contract, the Court said: "It follows as a consequence of the foregoing that the duty enjoined on the treasurer by the law only extended to the annual interest, and did not extend beyond it. His duty did not embrace the payment of interest accruing on coupons which were not paid when they became due." And quoted two authorities from the old supreme court, as far back as 1870, directly supporting the same proposition. These decisions, also, were long known and understood of all men, with the exception before mentioned. The brief in behalf of the city is over the name of A. P. Catlin and contains thirty-one pages. We have space but for a few sentences, and quote them only to show the utter ignorance of the pretender who now claims that he is the original Jacob, the discoverer of the idea that, under the funding act, we are not liable to pay compound interest on our bonds; and not only that he is the inventor, but that he, and he alone, brought it into use and made it known to the Court and judges and attorneys. When it is stated that his pen was never wielded, and his voice was never heard, in the supreme court in any city-bond case, and that all this claim is based on the fact that in 1888, long after the legal conundrum had been solved and had become already quite a venerable chestnut, he was, through a solicited but imprudently granted courtesy, allowed to ventilate some of his vagaries in the form of a brief before Judge Hunt, [the character and size of this pretense, or delusion, whichever it may be, can be estimated.

But to the quotations referred to in the brief in 1885; the question is stated thus in the opening sentence:

The question is not whether coupons having all the quality of commercial paper draw interest after maturity; but it is whether under the funding act of 1858, under which these coupons were issued, they draw interest if not paid at maturity by reason of the fund provided by the contract failing to be sufficient for the purpose.

The creditors' attorneys argued that, because the city had failed for years to put in the interest and sinking fund the full amount required by the contract law, therefore the city was liable for interest on the coupons which were not paid when due by reason of such failure. Against this proposition the counsel for the city labored by citation of authority, and by argument and illustration in every form, contending that the city was not liable for interest on the coupons of the city bonds, and that such interest was not recoverable in any form of action whatsoever. He said:

There was nothing in the nature of the contract from which it could be implied that the creditors were to have interest upon interest. No provision was made for putting money in the interest and sinking fund to pay such interest in any event. There was no forbearance by creditors nor detention of money by the city. The city did not agree to pay the creditors any compensation or damages in case any of the sources provided for the supply of the contract fund should fail, either from causes beyond the control of the officers, or from misconception of the law, or neglect of duty on the part of any of its officers.

The counsel quoted from the Amador and Calaveras cases in 28 Cal. and 39 Cal. to show that the principle he contended for had been long before settled. We might quote much more to show that this question was then thoroughly and exhaustively presented to the Supreme Court by the counsel for the city long years before Judge Beatty "set his wits to work" upon it, but space will not permit, and besides, the importance of the matter does not justify it. The pretense which we have detected and exposed is a harmless delusion, not a mischievous one, like many others emanating from the same fertile source. We cannot forbear, however, from exposing one more. In his communication to the News of November 5, he says the court, in the case of Davis vs. Porter, to which we have referred, in its opinion "suggested several different forms of action which he (Davis) might resort to in order to recover his interest." This was in 1885. Why has not Mr. Davis resorted to some one of these several actions thus suggested? There are four or five hundred thousand dollars in it for Mr. Davis. Perhaps Judge Beatty can "set his wits to work" and discover or invent an answer. As there is nothing in the opinion to justify this statement, we have characterized it as a delusion, for certainly it is a delusion to see that which so sharp a creditor as Davis cannot see, and which cannot be seen by anybody.

All roads do lead to Rome. Each of the plans of Judge Beatty lead inevitably to the oppressive taxation of this people. Surprised we are the press of the city should take stock in a scheme that can but result in a high rate of taxation. So prudent a business man as Major Weinstock foresees that with which we will be confronted if this "new plan" will be adopted. Sensibly Mr. Weinstock does remark: "While Judge Beatty's plan would hasten or expedite the payment of the city's funded debt, it would put taxes so high that all private enterprise would be checked until the time should arrive when, the debt being wiped out, taxation would drop. The citizen who might contemplate the erection of a building, for example, would naturally say that his interest would lie in waiting until the other fellows had paid the extra tax. Outsiders would also be deterred in like manner. These conditions more than offset any advantage that might come from hastening the payment of the debt." Let us look at this thing: To raise the assessment roll on personal property means an increase of revenue drainage from this people. The proposition to loan us $100,000 per annum of our own money will wipe out no debt; it simply means putting that sum annually into the hands of Meyer, Davis and Bates, and we will still owe the money to other parties. If we will levy a special tax, why not direct it to that which we sorely need? Levy directly for the construction of a suitable city hall, for sewerage and levee improvements. The people will not object to that. The bonds of this city are quoted above par in the stock market of San Francisco. It is patent they are snapped up with avidity; we are solvent. Reduce the revenue to the bond fund and levy special taxes for that which we need. So long as the revenues the city is permitted to receive from the water rates do not maintain the works, why not cut down the rates and give the poorer classes a chance of escape from oppression? Upon principle, we do oppose the saddling of this iniquitous debt upon this generation. That the ultimatum is given us we must pay it in five years, may be pleasing to the financial cormorants that hover about us; we say, Fight!

The members of the California Press Association have started in to secure the next annual meeting of the National Editorial Convention for California, with bright prospects for the successful accomplishment of their efforts. The holding of this convention within the borders of our state would be productive of more substantial results than could possibly come from the gathering of any national political convention, as the benefits derived from political assemblages are generally reaped by the hotel and saloon keepers. Instead of benefiting our state the political convention will have a tendency to retard its progress and development. The politician of to-day is a cold, selfish, scheming individual, looking only to his own personal interest and aggrandizement. Delegates to these conventions will interest themselves in matters political only, and will be constantly on the lookout for political preferment, not caring for nor wishing to learn anything of the possibilities of the future of California. Not so with the National Editorial Association, as the gentlemen comprising its organization are not of the kind to be satisfied with information usually gleaned in bar-rooms and hotel corridors, for their mission will be to visit every section of our state, to see and satisfy themselves as to the fertility of our beautiful valleys, our vineyards and orchards, our gold and silver producing mines, and our sublime mountain scenery. The State Board of Trade are earnestly coöperating with the Press Association, appreciating the grand results which will follow in the wake of this editorial convention, should California be determined upon as their next meeting place. The San Francisco merchants are loth to contribute from their purses to secure the national political conventions for their city. And they are right, for they will be called upon to house and feed a very large percentage of those who will be in attendance, and perhaps to pay the way home of a great number who hardly know nor care whether California is a state or a territory. Far better would it be for the merchant, the mechanic and the laborer in all parts of our state to join with the California Press Association to secure the editorial convention, as a truthful portrayal of their trip, description of their impressions of our state, will be read by millions of people, and which cannot fail to awaken in the minds of their readers a desire to visit the land so prolific and so promising of a bright and brilliant future. San Francisco should drop the political and lend her powerful influence to bring the National Editorial Convention to California.

The organization designated the "Farmers' Alliance" has made the fatal error of entering politics as a body. It might have been a power for good, but when it sunk its industrial and beneficial features into a machine to foist unworthy men, or, indeed, any men into office by reason of being members of the organization, it lost the respect of its own constituency. Such organizations as the alliance and federated trades unions are necessary, but when they enter politics for the purpose of securing office they prostitute their noble object with that of office-seeking and thereby absolve themselves from the true and golden bonds of sympathy of the masses. Such organizations should exert their beneficent influence toward securing good government without taking upon themselves the functions of a political party, with all the greed of office for what is in it. The late elections show that the alliance, as a political party, is on the decline, and will disappear before the great national campaign. In fact, there is no reason for its existence in that campaign, which is now fully outlined on the basis of protection and reciprocity on one side and free trade on the other.

Through the efforts of Mr. Jerry Lynch, the grand jury of San Francisco has found true bills against Chris Buckley and Sam Rainey for political corruption. When the blind white devil was at the zenith of his power this same Jerry was one of his most abject followers. He and Clarence Greathouse were the dis-bursers of the Hearst boodle, when that gentleman was before the democratic convention in San José seeking the nomination for governor. Later Jeremiah wanted to represent his district in congress, and was a constant supplicant for Chris' influence to aid him in securing the nomination, failing to obtain which he has ever since been endeavoring to pose as a great political reformer. In his methods Jerry Lynch has been as great a boodler as Chris Buckley—if anything worse; and if the latter could only be afforded an opportunity of making public the one-half of what he knows of Mr. Lynch's work in the field of politics Jerry in all probability would feel like skipping out for Montreal himself.

Lines Written in an Autograph Album by Noted Men and Women.

Every one who knows anything about Boston is familiar with the Parker House, one of the oldest and most popular hotels in the Puritanic city, writes a correspondent of the Detroit Free Press. So, too, they are probably acquainted with its clerk, F. M. Purmorth, one of the most genial and kindly men, and as far removed as possible from the popular idea of what a hotel clerk is. Mr. Purmorth has a very interesting autograph book which the writer had the pleasure of examining the other day. It has a plain rich binding, and is slipped into a sealskin case which fastens with a silver clasp. Do not for a moment think that Mr. Purmorth is an autograph fiend. He would be the last man in the world to thrust a book into the face of a celebrated person and demand this signature. These attentions were shown him in return for many favors done to these distinguished guests, and many kindnesses which were outside his duties as clerk of a large hotel.

You open the book and are at once in the society of eminent men and women. Some of them still in the flesh, others alas! gone to the great majority.

Poor old Dion Boucicault illumines one of the first pages with two sentiments. Nothing tells one if both were written at the same time, but I think not, for the first is as follows: "Every man has music in himself. Though he may have no ear nor voice for it. Love is music—sweet when it is a duet—sad when it is a solo." That seems like an utterance when life and hope were still young. The other, as if they both had vanished and naught remained but Dead Sea fruit and ashes: "Ah! does life ever fulfill that which it promises? One begins so full of hope, and dashes forward, strong in faith, toward a sunny future, but each day an illusion vanishes, a pleasure melts away, until at last one finds one's self alone. The mask torn away and parched with a thirst for happiness one can never quench."

Here is something truly valuable. A verse from that most poetic poet, though caustic critic, William Winter:

"Beneath the midnight moon of May—
Though dark on either hand,
One sheet of silver spreads the bay,
One crescent yet the land.

The dark ships mirrored in the stream,
Their ghostly tresses shake—
When will the dead world cease to dream?
When will the morning wake?"

Nellie Bly, the plucky little journalist who beat the record in her trip around the world, wrote, in 1890, in a very school-girlish hand: "A strong determination, added to a certain amount of energy, will overcome any obstacle in life—except death."

Dear old William Warren, so long one of Boston's institutions; for Boston was nothing in his day without a sight of him and a hearty laugh at his real humor. His place knows him no more, and will never be filled. He wrote in 1886:

Hard is his fate on whom the public gaze
Is fixed forever to detract or praise.
Repose denies her requiem to his name,
And folly loves the martyrdom of fame.

Here is Francis Wilson's sentiment. How truly it applies to all those who have "assisted" in his fun:

I laugh so heartily
That both my eyes were rainy.

While Lydia Thompson, true to her calling, says:

Let mirth go on;
Let pleasure know no pause.

Would you believe that Marie Jansen, tricky sprite, so full of music, fun and folly, as bright and active as a canary bird, writes as precise a hand as a New England old maid or an ancient schoolmarm? This is her quotation:

"Fame is but a breath of dust,
But—oblivion is solid mud."

Ed Sothorn scribbles hastily these naughty words: "A sentiment? What is sentiment without whisky?"

Wilson Barret quotes from Clito this truth: "Profoundest, saddest mystery of life: the ones we wound are always those we love."

Justin McCarthy, the great home ruler, writes the trembling hand of an old man, but his idea is strong and virile: "The coming of home rule for Ireland is an event as certain as the rising of to-morrow's sun." 1887.

"Will sich days as these ever come ag'in?" asked Lotta in '85.

"No matter what you do if your 'art be true," says Rosina Volkes.

Geraldine Ulmer, now lost to us in her English home, wrote in '86 the familiar words she had so often and so fetchingly sung: "We're very wide awake, the moon and I."

Dixey, in '86, gave from his mascot, Adonis: "I never was born; I was quarried."

What do you suppose made golden-voiced Adeline Patti, whose life one would think was passed amid sunshine and flowers, inscribe this astute opinion, in a fine Italian hand?—"Go to strangers for charity, acquaintances for advice, and to relatives for nothing, and you will have a supply."

Salvini gives some thought in Italian, but so singular is the writing, one cannot translate it.

Now hear from Richard Mansfield, who quotes from Beau Brummel, his best play and finest assumption: "Did it ever occur to you how thoughtful the Creator was when he gave us bodies, to give them to us naked that we might dress and ornament them as we choose?"

Henry Neville, the English actor, who was such a social as well as dramatic success in Boston, copied the whole of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's well known poem, beginning: "Laugh, and the world laughs with you."

Wilton Lackaye gives a somewhat hackneyed quotation from one of Longfellow's poems.

Henry Irving and Marie Burroughs borrow from the immortal Shakspeare fitting phrases.

Emma Nevada avows, "J'ai foi."

Julia Marlowe in the largest and coarsest of scribble declares: "I come anon."

There are many mere autographs of noted actors and the only sentiment surrounding these one may evolve from his inner consciousness or the happy remembrances connected with their names. Among these are Ellen Terry, Nellie Farren, and Fred Leslie Judic and Pauline l'Allemand, with a bar of music from the score of Lakine.

But this precious book is not filled with actors' names alone. On one page are the names of ex-Pres nt Cleveland and his lovely wife; but isn't it curious that he writes a fine, so-called lady-like hand, while his is bold and large?

The chirography of General Sheridan is also bold and prominent, while on the opposite page—strange juxtaposition—is Carmencita's queer scrawl.

Nearly all the members of President Cleveland's cabinet have inscribed their noteworthy names in this little book. Also the whole of the Stanley party, headed by Dorothy Tennant in the quaintest caligraphy, while at the bottom of the page appears the enigmatical Major Pond, the well-known manager. This is undecipherable to any but the initiated.

Robert G. Ingersoll tells us: "Love was the first to dream of immortality;" and Blanche Willis Howard takes that "Love is mightier than death or the fear of death. Love alone inspires and is the life of all."

George Augustus Sala in '85 wrote as follows: "I have always been of opinion that a mere signature is, of itself, a very unmeaning thing; so I have ventured to supplement my humble autograph by a slip of copy from a novel of my writing." But as the promised extract does not follow, perhaps it was intended for a joke.

Roscoe Conkling does not agree with him, however, for his contribution is: "An autograph may itself be a titmouse."

Edison, whose name is known all over the world, whose wonderful inventions have almost revolutionized the world's ways, writes like print with the blackest of ink and heavily shaded:

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave Await alike th' inevitable hour;
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

Doubtless Ho Shen Chee, of the Chinese legation, meant to convey some tender or wise saying in the "chicken tracks," which cover one whole page.

Next, the monarch of caricaturists, has filled another page with a sketch evidently intended to be humorous and with some occult meaning. It goes without saying that even if you don't know the joke the drawing is funny.

These names are the most noteworthy, though there are others of local significance; but haven't you been introduced to a charming company?

They say that Gen. Wise could swear with more fluency and volubility than any other officer in the Confederate army. Once when Gen. Lee, in mock seriousness, rebuked him for the failing, Wise said: "Well, general, you do the praying for the army and I'll do the swearing."

The Stage.

Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.

Quart Robson was married last Tuesday to Miss Mary Waldron, a handsome and popular young actress.

Pick Golden, "Jed Prouty," has become so addicted to drink that he is compelled to try the bi-chloride of gold cure.

A lady named Bohn was the successful competitor with two men for the position of harpist in the theater at Leipsic, a position never before filled by a woman.

Cardou's new play, Raissa, is Russian, like Fedora. The chief part will be created by Mme. Brandes. The story is from "Les Eprevues de Raissa," by Henri G. Ville, who is helping in the dramatization.

The great baritone Faure, once the pet of the Parisian lyric stage, leads a life of almost Arcadian retirement in a villa at Etretat. Every year in the village church he gives a benefit concert for the local clergy.

Someone has discovered a book in Dublin with the words of "The Messiah" as sold at the first performance in that city in 1741. It shows that "He shall feed his flock" was taken right through by one voice, the contralto, who was Mrs. Cibber.

The Bee says that Major Anderson and Billy Hamilton are liable to break loose with their awful amateurs. Well, if they do "break loose" Sacramento will have some choice dramatic entertainments. Sacramento is particularly noted for its talented amateurs.

The legitimate drama is not appreciated in rural Maine. A company that was organized at Fairfield last week to play Romeo and Juliet lived two nights. "Romeo" is now at work in a sawmill, while "Juliet" stuck a job in a plain, every-day cotton factory.

Among the eminent Jewish composers in this century the Jewish Chronicle names Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, Moscheles, Halevy, Herz, Hiller, David, Goldmark, Rosenham and Rubinstein. At one time Meyerbeer was sneered at for "putting Judaism in his music."

In musical circles there is a growing opposition to the "encore fiend," who is always sure to make his appearance at concerts. It is proposed that the words

"No encores" shall be printed in big type on concert programmes, and that managers shall adhere to the rule.

An Englishman of culture is alleged to have had the following conversation with Sol Smith Russell: "You are," said he, "an actor of real promise. I have enjoyed your performance so highly that I venture, in a spirit of admiration, to venture a suggestion. I trust I am not offending." "Oh, no; not at all," urged Mr. Russell. "Go on, my dear sir; I am only too glad to hear suggestions." "Well, then," continued the stranger, "it occurs to me that you would do well in comedy; have you ever tried to do a comic part?"

A theatrical manager who had a limited purse, and consequently a limited company, occasionally compelled some of the actors to "double"—that is, play two or more parts in the same piece. "Lancaster," he said one morning, addressing a very serviceable utility man, "you will have to enact three parts in The Silent Foe to-night—Henderson, 'Uncle Bill' and the 'Crusher.'" "Can't do it," replied Lancaster; "impossible; can't be done." "You can't do it? You won't do it? Why?" "Because it is impossible," returned the indignant actor. "No human being can play those three parts at the same time. In the first scene of the third act two of them have a fight and the third fellow runs in and separates them."

The American prima donna has become one of the institutions of Europe, where she seems to be better appreciated than at home. She may now be found in all the opera-houses of the continent. Mme Adiny (Miss Chapman, of Boston,) is leading dramatic prima donna at the Grand Opera of Paris, and has signed an engagement to sing at Covent Garden, in London. Miss Sybil Sanderson is impersonating "Nanon" at the Paris Opera-Comique. Miss Ella Russell is in Milan preparing for a series of performances in Warsaw, and Emma Nevada has recently had an immense success at Cadiz. Mme. Nevada's little daughter Mignon, when asked by a visitor how she managed to pass the time, said: "Sometimes I play with my dolly, but usually I meditate over mamma's career."

"Have you read Holmes' 'At the Breakfast Table'?" "No, I don't have time—I have to leave on such an early train."

A new novel by a Chicago author is entitled "Edge-tools." This will be one of the Chicago articles that are dangerous to handle.

Walt Whitman in his declining years has escaped the fate that Dean Swift feared, that of "dying at the top" first. Though his bodily powers fail, the old poet's mind remains clear and vigorous.

At the recent conference of Bohemian and Hungarian authors held in Pesth, Hungary, there were poets and prose writers, young and old, renowned and unrenowned, some of them very handsome, and others not so. The growth of literature and the rights of authors were under debate at the conference.

After France we possess the greatest short-story writers in the world. This is a long step. Who knows that the novel in which England has excelled is not doomed to extinction? Our triumph in literature will come in due time—probably as soon as we cease to worry about whether we are going to have it or not.

American authors are beginning to find out that the international copyright law is not making them rich so fast as they fancied it would. American books do not sell in England; there are notable exceptions, of course, but, as a class, books made this side of the Atlantic are not in demand the other side of the Atlantic. The English people are not readers—or perhaps we should say they are not book-buyers. They patronize their circulating libraries, and these libraries are slow to introduce the works of American writers.

"The Shadow of Shame," is a Frenchy novel by Austyn Granville. The author is a cousin of Rider Haggard, and a good writer. The heroine is sketched after a living model, and based on facts. The book performs a mission for the improvement of society by the exposure of status of the marriage laws of France. It also denounces the prevailing custom of sending young messenger boys to places where they become accustomed to the sight of vice. While the story is somewhat flashy and Frenchy, it is readable.

The Ameer of Afghanistan can forgive a rascal who steals the public moneys, but he has no mercy on a literary thief who purloins verses from the Ameer's favorite poets. A few months ago an official was brought before him for trial on the charge of robbing the treasury. During the investigation it was proven that the fellow was a poetaster, and likewise a great plagiarist. "I may not punish him for the thefts of public money," said the Ameer, "but I cannot pardon him for literary thefts from the work of saintly poets like Saadi and Hafiz." So the Ameer ordered the tongue of the poor wretch to be perforated by long needles, and this remarkable sentence was carried out at once.

Froude, the historian, has finally concluded to defend his work against sundry assaults, and incidentally he defends Henry VIII, who stands badly in need of something of the sort. "I do not pretend to impartiality," he says. "I believe the Reformation to have been the greatest incident in English history. I am unwilling to believe more evil than I can help of my countrymen who accomplished so magnificent a work." It is pretty hard for one man to do full justice to the before-mentioned king's labors. Every day of his life, if he was not busy in marrying a new wife or killing an old one, he was constructing a system of theology to fit the conditions of the current week. As a marrying man and theologian he was clearly at the head of his profession.

Carruthers, a Scotch editor, looked so much like Thackeray, that upon one occasion when Carruthers called upon Thackeray, the maid who met him at the door laughed in his face because she thought her master in a fit of absent-mindedness had come home and asked for himself. The likeness must have been less remarkable, however, than that between a Southern Presbyterian minister and the elder of a neighboring flock. The two were constantly mistaken for each other, and finally one day when the elder was in New York he excused himself from an acquaintance upon the plea that he must go and speak to his friend, the minister, advanced toward a large mirror, and was actually about to hold out his hand when he discovered that he had mistaken his own reflection for his flesh-and-blood double. Both parson and elder have injured their reputations for veracity by telling this unquestionably true story.

The young graduate who takes up medicine finds it pleasanter than taking it down.

Lawyers never plead ignorance of the law. They make their clients do it for them.

Bishop Gaines, of Georgia, a Methodist, was once a slave of Robert Toombs' brother.

There is a law maxim that equity follows the law, which may be true, but she don't always overtake it.

Law business is so dull that one of the legal fraternity is reported to have filed a saw recently just to keep in practice.

That Philadelphia doctor who detects insanity by listening to the wind rustling in his patients' brains must be a graduate of Prof. Keely's wind-motor school.

One of the notable students at Oxford is Cornelia Sorabji, an olive-skinned Hindoo girl. She is a remarkable scholar, especially excelling in her knowledge of the Roman law.

The fact that astute lawyer Hubbard was "trapped by a country attorney" in the legal battle over the Hopkins-Searles will should not cause any great amount of surprise. The country lawyer in his wide range of practice is obliged to enter into all sorts and conditions of litigation, and the result is that he becomes a well-rounded fellow and a dangerous opponent for the legal specialist from the city.

A clergyman from England, in an earnest address to his parishioners advocating the establishment of a cemetery, asked them to consider the "deplorable condition of 30,000 Englishmen living without a Christian burial." This suggests another clerical slip, says an exchange. "When do you expect to see deacon Smith again?" a gentleman asked a clergyman. "Never," replied the reverend gentleman, solemnly; "the deacon is in heaven."

Senator Pepper is now making speeches at local fairs in Kansas. Mr. Pepper is another picturesque illustration of the homely adage that water soon finds its level. What a contrast between this weakling and that brilliant statesman Ingalls. This is about the way all "reformers" fizzle out. There has never been a case where this class of men are thrown to the top wave by spasmodic action of the misguided masses that any good results have followed from their actions. We have experienced this fact in California through the "sand lot" upheaval and "people's" parties.

Great lawyers may not know how to make wills for themselves, but they know how to elope with their sweethearts sometimes. There was Chancellor Eldon, who carried away his "Bessie," the story goes, out of a second-story window. And our "American Blackstone," as he is sometimes called, the greatest lawyer in Michigan, Thomas M. Cooley, got his wife in the same way, against the will of her farmer father, more than thirty years ago. Judge Cooley would be high on a list of the half dozen best authorities on law in this country. He has recently resigned from the Interstate Commerce Commission and lives quietly at Ann Arbor.

NOTES.

Under our new election law every voter is bound to make his mark in politics. Here is one instance where the educated and ignorant are on the level.

Don't treat the poor man with disdain,
Though you're a man of note.
Some time for office you may strain;
Then you will want his vote.

In nearly all reforms in the political atmosphere there is invariably a preponderance of "hair-trigger jaws and flint-lock brains." Our municipal government can never be improved by any such influences.

There are two positive recipes in this world for unhappiness. One is idleness, the other accumulation. More than your share of anything makes you miserable, whether it be dirt, money, neckties, old papers, or poor relations.

The Pleiades appear to the naked eye to number six or seven stars. Viewed through a three-inch telescope you may see perhaps three hundred. If a sensitive plate is exposed for four hours it will show from the group 2,326 stars.

All Hohenzollern princes are baptized with water from the Jordan. A large porcelain jug of this water is kept in the shop of the castle apothecary, and after every baptism the water left in the fount is carefully returned to this receptacle.

One of the popular superstitions of the negro of antebellum days was that, if a honeysuckle had forced its way through the chinks of the cabin and was growing inside, as it often did, it was a sure indication that they had not led upright lives.

Public servants (office-holders), after election or appointment, become moral cowards. They fear to do what is right, fearful of some adverse criticism of newspapers or of some of their constituents. It is rare, indeed, to find independence in an official.

Johnny cake and other preparations of American corn appear as novelties. Mr. Phelps' bang will soon be as popular on this side of the water as was the late Roscoe Conkling's hyperion curl among his New York admirers. It will be a badge of honor.

There was too much beer at a New York wedding, and the result was the sending of the groom to the nearest police station and his best man to Bellevue hospital. The groom is being groomed and the best man is still the worst, physically, of the party. So much for immoderate joy.

The trustees of the Sacramento Law Library have organized by electing Hon. A. P. Catlin, President; Hon. W. C. Van Fleet, Treasurer, and W. A. Anderson, Secretary. It is proposed to use the room opposite the County Clerk's office for the library. Within a few weeks the library will be open, and will prove a great convenience for the courts as well as attorneys.

Shirley Dare says that fruit cake is more nourishing than modern bread, and that if one girl were to eat only fruit cake and another only bread for a week, it would be found that the cake-eater kept her strength better than the one who lived on bread alone. This may seem a daring statement for Shirley to make, but every schoolgirl will arise and call her blessed.

Our city is getting too good; we will soon become a first-class New Jerusalem. The energies of the city authorities are directed solely against some fellow who sells a glass of beer and sandwiches after midnight. Men can be knocked down and robbed in the residence portion of the city because the police force is so diligent, under orders, to watch the midnight-saloon men down town. No matter how many robberies, burglaries and murders are committed, the "moral" standing of the city must be looked after in the matter of selling crackers and cheese and beer after midnight.

Nothing is easier than to find fault. Almost everything we hear or see is open to criticism, and if we live to pick flaws we are readily kept busy. Conversation is defective. Few can express their exact meaning in words, and not a few say what they don't mean simply because they cannot say what they wish to. And if nearly all speech is imperfect, so is nearly all work. Do his best, man will yet do poorly enough. His greatest plans, his smallest schemes, will be but imperfectly accomplished; and if sensitive to criticism, the probability is that he will suffer when he hears what people have to say concerning his doings.

The uses made of the refuse of Paris streets are numerous. Little wisps of women's hair are carefully unraveled and do duty for false hair by-and-by. Men's hair collected outside the barbers' shop serve for filters through which syrups are strained; bits of sponge are cut up and used for spirit lamps; bits of bread, if dirty, are toasted and grated and sold to the restaurants for spreading on hams or cutlets; sometimes they are carbonized and made into tooth powder. Sardine boxes are cut into tin soldiers or into sockets for candlesticks. A silk hat has a whole chapter of adventures in store for it. All this work employs a regiment of rag pickers numbering close on to 20,000, and each earning from 20 pence to a half a crown a day.

Man is rapidly causing the extinction of almost all land animals, at least the larger ones. As the frontiers of civilization are being extended further and further into the uninhabited regions, he is driving out of existence all of the large animals and many of the smaller ones. We have only to look ahead a comparatively short time to see the extinction of nearly all land animals, except such as may strike man's fancy to use or preserve. To what extent this may apply to other animals—to insects, marine animals, etc.—is not clear. But in the highest group of animals, the vertebrates, it is pretty clear that man is eventually to bring about, not only the end of advance, but also the practical extermination of all animals except such as he especially preserves. His mastery over the higher vertebrates is so unbounded that he is the only one who has any possibility of further advance. With the lower animals his competition is not so severe, but, as we have seen, these lower types have practically ended their evolution in the distant past.

"Old Hickory's" Indorsement.

Occasionally boarding-house keepers here have trouble in collecting their bills from government clerks. Occasionally they haunt the departments in order to get the money due them, making life more or less of a burden to the debtor and not particularly enjoyable to the officials in whose ears the plaintive tale is told with great volubility and at great length, says a Washington writer in the Brooklyn Eagle. The grim old hero of Tohopeka and New Orleans once paused long enough in his war on the United States bank and Nick Biddle to help a landlady collect a board bill from a long-delinquent debtor. The debtor in question held a responsible position in one of the departments. He was a man of fascinating address, and the landlady thought herself fortunate in securing so fine a man for a boarder. But he would not pay regularly nor would he pay in full. At the end of every month he would sometimes pay a part of his bill and sometimes he would pay nothing at all. At such times he would give the landlady what the boys nowadays call a "song and dance." Affairs went on in this way for two or three years, until the indebtedness threatened to bankrupt the landlady. In her despair she had recourse to a desperate plan. She went to the White House and was ushered into the president's presence. She told him her story, to which Old Hickory listened politely. He then said:

"I have Mr. Blank give you his note at ninety days for the entire amount of his indebtedness to you, and when that is done bring the note to me."

The landlady did so. Mr. Blank signed the note cheerfully, wondering what she would do with it, as he had no property and his salary was not subject to garnishment. When she took the note to the president he read it carefully, expressed his satisfaction, turned it over and wrote "A. Jackson" on the back of it. Handing it to the grateful landlady, he said:

"Put that in bank for collection."

She did so. In those days the banks here did not send out notices to the givers of notes when these interesting documents fell due. They waited till the day of doom, as it were, and then sent their collector out to hunt up the victim and get the money. When Mr. Blank's note fell due the collector called on him. Mr. Blank received him affably, took the note, read it leisurely and said, with a smile:

"My dear sir, I am not prepared to take this up to-day. I—"

Here he turned it over, saw "A. Jackson" boldly written across the back, gasped, turned pale and nearly fell out of his official chair. Recovering, he continued, with difficulty: "I will, however, meet it before the days of grace expire." He did, for he dared not go back on his indorsement.

On Atheism.

"I had rather," says Sir Francis Bacon, "believe all the fables in the Legend, the Talmud, and the Koran, than that this universal frame is without a mind. God never wrought miracles to convince atheists, because His ordinary works are sufficient to convince them. It is true that a little philosophy inclineth men's minds to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth them back to religion; for while the mind of man looketh upon second causes scattered, it may sometimes rest on them, and go no further; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederate and linked together, it must needs fly to Providence and Deity."

An Old Belief.

Hundreds and hundreds of years have passed away since it was first believed that a creature called the sea-serpent lived in the ocean. The wonderful stories related concerning this "horrid wiggler of the sea," as Dædmon calls it, made timid sailors tremble with fear and the heart of the bravest sea captain quail at the very thought of encountering the dreadful creature. Pliny, who lived and wrote at about the time of Christ, mentions it several times in his works, never neglecting to call it a horrid and wonderful amphibious animal. "It swims about in shallow shore water," he says, "until it grows to enormous proportions, when it floats out to sea, because it can then wriggle about its large body in perfect freedom." Pliny also states that it was a monstrous and dangerous creature, capable of destroying ships and devouring sailors. Belleforest, the French writer on natural history, adds testimony almost identical with that of Pliny. He says: "There is also a more terrible monster than that just described above (having just described a salamander), called a sea-snake, from its habit of frequenting the salt sea a great distance from land, where he lays in wait for the unwary seaman, wrecks the vessel and devours them all. * * *

In case the barque is too large to be easily managed by the serpent, he glides under it and, with the folds of his slimy body pressing against the keel, draws, or rather pushes, the ship onto a reef, where the crew are swallowed at leisure."

The most ancient Scandinavian writers never committed the heresy of doubting the North sea to be swarming with sea-serpents of all ages, sizes and kinds. In the popular Scandinavian belief the sea-serpent of the Northern ocean could very appropriately be styled serpents terrible, as he was usually described as being from 600 to 1,000 feet in length, with a head like a horse, a spiked tail, large black eyes and a flowing white mane. In early trips to Iceland large buoys of brush were towed in the wake of some vessels in hope of entangling sea serpent hairs. This was a practice usually followed in the spring of the year, the sea-serpent being supposed to change his skin and lose his mane on Easter Sunday, and to have them perfectly renewed by St. John's Eve, June 24th.

Dead Man's Island.

From time immemorial, says a southern California exchange, people have called the island at the end of our breakwater "Dead Man's island," and many traditions have been given as to the origin of the name. It is well to unearth all reliable local history; and it may be that we have now among us someone who can throw light on the real origin of the name. If so, it were well that he place his knowledge on record. One tradition says that the island takes its name from the fact that Fremont buried some of his soldiers there in order that their bodies might not be dug up by the coyotes which infested the mainland. This cannot be the origin of the name, for Dana, in his book, "Two Years Before the Mast"—written, we think, about 1835—spoke of the place already as Dead Man's island. However, as at least one of the headboards on the island was that of an American soldier belonging to a certain-named regiment, this theory as to name would have some color were it not for Dana's notice in 1835 or thereabouts.

Another theory is that the early Spanish settlers found some decomposing bodies washed ashore on the island and buried them thereon; hence the name.

Another tradition says that way back in the thirties the sailors of an English ship mutinied and murdered their cruel captain and buried him on the island.

Another tradition says that a pirate vessel marooned two sailors and that the dead bodies of the two men gave the island its name.

A Very Old Invention.

The typewriter was invented as long ago as 1714, by one Henry Mills, who in that year obtained a patent in this country for a device that "would write printed characters one at a time, one after the other." There is no description of this device to be had now, says the New York Press, but there is no doubt that Mills' invention was the parent of the present typewriter.

In 1833 a French patent was granted to M. Prognin (Xavier), of Marseilles, for a typewriter, which is called a typographical machine. The account of the machine is somewhat obscure, but enough is given to show that it was an operative one by which typewriting could be fairly well executed. M. Foucault sent to the Paris exhibition in 1855 a writing machine for the blind, and several typewriters were invented by Wheatstone. After successive improvements a manufacturer in America contracted to construct 25,000.

All Esquimaux are superstitious about death, and although they hold festivals in memory of departed friends, they will usually carry a dying person to some abandoned hut, there to drag out his remaining days without food, medicine, water or attendance. After the death of a husband or wife the survivor cuts the front hair short and fasts for twenty-five days.

A Pretty Wedding.

"It's just a year ago to-day," said she who told the story. "We had been schoolmates, and she had asked me to come on an early train and help her and her mother through the day. It was nine in the morning when I stepped under the woodbine that grew about the door of that angular little house on the edge of a New England village. She had a broad hat on and she said 'Come.'"

"We went out into the pasture land beyond the village and we filled our arms with golden rod and cardinal flowers. Then we walked back to the house and her mother fetched jars and vases and big bowls and we put our flowers about the rooms."

"He came by the noon train and she went to the gate in her print dress and her broad hat to meet him. We had a little dinner together, her mother, he, she and I."

"Then she went to dress and came down stairs again in half an hour in a simple little white gown. It was two o'clock when the neighbors began to arrive. She went to the door to meet them herself, and she took the minister's hat and showed the minister's wife where to put her things."

"Then by and by the minister said, 'Are you ready?' and she said, 'Yes.' And then the two of them stood before the minister, and she put one hand behind her and into the hand of her mother, who sat just there on the sofa. And when the minister began, 'Will you—' she said 'I will,' before he got half through."

"After that she put on a white apron and saw that we all had cake and ice cream. Then, when it was time for her to go away, she changed her dress again and we all walked to the railway station to see her started. When the train came pulling up she turned to me: 'Stay with mother till to-morrow and I'll get a letter for her by that time. She'll be lonely this evening.'"

"I never expect to again attend so pretty a wedding.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Superstition in Rome.

The death of the late Prince Barberini was popularly attributed in Rome to the effect of the evil eye of Pope Pius IX. Strange though it may appear, the spell of his mal oculo is believed to continue even to this day, fourteen or fifteen years after his death. Every year a memorial service is celebrated in his honor by his successor, Leo XIII, in the Sistine chapel. It is a magnificent ceremony and is attended by all the diplomatic corps and the principal dignitaries of the papal court. But on each occasion one of the leading Roman nobles who has been present has died a few days afterward. The last death of this kind was that of Prince Barberini, and, under the circumstances, it is hardly surprising that the Roman aristocracy are beginning to show a decided reluctance to attend the annual services in memory of Pius IX, and that the gallery reserved for their use in the Sistine chapel has been almost empty on the last three occasions.

The Death of Polygamy.

There are probably 150,000 Mormons in this territory; but of that number many are only nominally so. Amid the contentions between them and the Gentiles, many have sided with the church in which are their parents, relatives, and friends, without embracing its faith. It is idle now to think of disfranchising the Latter-day Saints. They are industrious, temperate people as a rule, and my observation has led me to believe that they are law-abiding since the church took its stand under the law against plural marriage. I am aware that now and then individuals will report violations of that law since the manifesto, but upon investigation such charges are seldom sustained. It would be strange if there were no breaches of it; there are some such cases among non-Mormons. I do not believe that such marriages have been authorized or sanctioned by the officers of the Mormon church since the manifesto.—Judge Charles S. Zane in November Forum.

Badge-wearing is the mania of the age, and the boothlark who cannot find some sort of a metallic label dignified by the term "badge" is certainly not up with his fellows. But badge-wearing in the dignified sense is confined to the more powerful orders and to college fraternities. A local jeweler who has observed the ways and customs of students who are also "frat" men says that no class of society men indulge in expensive and gaudy badges to the extent that these young fraternity men do. Badges to be worn during only a college course and then sold to a younger collegian at reduced rates, or else stowed away as an individual trophy, frequently cost as high as $400 or $500, and $100 badges are quite common. The unpretentious "frat" man, however, usually contents himself with expending $25 or $30 and retains his badge long after throwing aside his Tacitus and Homer. The sororities (the college sisterhoods—the Kappa Alpha Theta, the Kappa Kappa Gamma, Delta Gamma, Pi Kappa Alpha) have taken up the craze for badge-wearing, and the jewels the enthusiastic college-society girls wear are even more gorgeous and costly than those worn by the fraters.—Albany Argus.

A Fly in the Nose.

We have all experienced the torment of a fly persistently lighting on our nose, but a singular case of a fly entering the nasal cavity is reported by a physician from a neighboring county, in the Occidental Medical Times, as follows: On August 27th I was called to see a woman, suffering from an intense headache and high fever, of 48 hours' duration. The patient was suffering terribly; face flushed, temperature 103° F., pulse very full and bounding, pupils normal. She was perfectly rational, but was almost crazed with the pain in her head. The intense headache and absence of other causes of fever, made me suspect the onset of meningitis, although the usual symptoms were absent. Noticing her breath had a very foul odor, I syringed the nasal cavities with peroxide of hydrogen (Marchand's). This came out in the frothy state usually produced by peroxide in the presence of pus, and in this froth were two maggots. The patient then remembered that four days previous, when asleep during the afternoon, she had been awakened by a fly entering her nose. She squeezed her nostrils, but nothing came out. After a few minutes she again felt something in her nose, and this time succeeded in ejecting a large "blow-fly." Using a post-nasal syringe, I injected the nasal cavities with kerosene. This began to dislodge the invaders, and I succeeded in bringing away during the day about a hundred full grown maggots, mixed with a very disgusting mucus. I also insufflated calomel, by means of a gun for blowing insect powder. After persistent effort for five days, and expelling about 200 of the unwelcome guests, I could get no more. The fever gradually subsided, and with some further treatment of the inflamed mucous membrane, the patient recovered. The discovery of the maggots made the reason of the terrible suffering and the increasing noise very evident. She had for some time suffered from ozena, and this no doubt attracted the fly. It must have deposited about 200 eggs in the few minutes it was in her nose. These eggs must have developed into maggots sufficiently large to cause pain in 36 hours, and in four days they were about half an inch long.

The Pleasures of Old Age.

One forenoon I did prevail with my mother to let them carry her to a considerable distance from the house, to a sheltered, sunny spot, whereunto we did often resort formerly to hear the wood-pigeons which frequented the fir trees hereabout. We seated ourselves and did pass an hour or two very pleasantly. She remarked, how merciful it was ordered that these pleasures should remain to the last days of life; that when the infirmities of age make the company of others burdensome to us and ourselves a burden to them, the quiet contemplation of the works of God affords a simple pleasure which needeth not aught else than a contented mind to enjoy the singing of birds; even a single flower, or a pretty spot like this, with its bank of primroses, and the brook running in there below, and this warm sunshine, how pleasant they are. They take back our thoughts to our youth, which age doth love to look back upon.—Diary of Lady Willoughby.

On November 20th the famous Dr. Bitt will be given at the Metropolitan. This is one of the drawing comedies of the day. The company is first class.

Goodyear, Elitch & Schellings minstrels played to a full house last night. The combination is thoroughly good. To-night the same company, with changes in the bill.

Sinbad and Cleopatra were both booked for Sacramento, but when the managers of the companies found that the scenery would not fit the Metropolitan stage they would not consent to play here. In each of these plays the scenery forms a very important factor in the performance, without which the effect would be greatly marred. For this reason the Sacramento public was deprived of the pleasure of witnessing two of the greatest attractions on the road.

A New Dance.

Devotees of dancing will be glad of the new waltz, the "Jubilee." It is certain to win a triumph—just as certain as society dons her dancing shoes. As a matter of fact, beginners want to waltz the first thing, and inability to reverse is apt to discourage them. Now the ardent swain, the college fellow, the apoplectic dandy in his second childhood, and the fair, fat and frisky widow who gets dizzy when she tries to go around backward will commence with the "Jubilee" master it in two lessons, and get a fine opinion of themselves all through a bit of trickery on the part of the composer.

There is no reversing, but a great deal of revolving to the right. The partners take waltz position and dance two "dips" to the side, separating, advance one step, then kick with the inside foot and again with the outside; join hands, swing in waltz position and take four waltz steps.

This mischievous, captivating dance will, in all probability, score a double success, for some rogue will be certain to write a song accompaniment.

St. Joseph's Academy.

This is to certify that we have for many years had in constant use six Mathushek Solid Iron-Frame Pianos, which have given the most perfect satisfaction, and more than any pianos we have ever used. Twenty years of extraordinary use has made very little, if any, change in their tone. We heartily recommend the Mathushek to anyone wanting a strictly first-class piano.

Curiosities About Coins.

Certain passages in the Iliad of Homer would lead to the inference that coins of brass were struck as early as 1184 years B. C. Tradition affirms that the Chinese had bronze coins as early as 1120 B. C. But Herodotus, "the Father of History," ascribes the "invention" of coins to the Lydians, about nine centuries B. C.; and there is no satisfactory evidence that coins were known prior to that date.

The original process of coining was very simple. A globular piece of metal, having a defined weight, was placed on a die, engraved with some national or religious symbol, and struck with a hammer until it had received the impression. One of the most ancient Asiatic coins was the Persians Daric, a gold coin struck during the reign of Darius, nearly five centuries B. C. The first coinage in Rome was about the year 600 B. C. The metal used was bronze, and the unit of value was one pound in weight. The coin was called an as; was brick-shaped, and stamped with the figure of a sheep or an ox.

Silver was first coined at Rome in the year 275 B. C. The first Roman gold coin was issued only about 74 years B. C.

The Saxons coined the first British pieces about the year 279 A. D.

The first Colonial coin issued in this country were struck in Massachusetts in 1652. They were 3, 6, and 12 pence pieces.

Bimini and the Fountain of Youth.

Bimini was a fabulous island firmly believed in by the Indians of the Antilles, though they could give no further clew to its location than that it lay some hundreds of leagues north of Hispaniola. On this island was the famous Fountain of Youth which had the power of restoring youth and giving perpetual health and vigor. It was the search for this fountain that led Ponce de Leon and Hernando de Soto to Florida, on the outskirts of which the island was generally supposed to be situated.

Heredity.

There is no thing we cannot overcome;
Say not thy evil instinct is inherited,
Or that some trait inborn makes thy whole life forlorn
And calls down punishment that is not merited.

Back of thy parents and grandparents lies
The Great Eternal Will! That, too, is thine
Inheritance, strong, beautiful, divine,
Sure lever of success for one who tries.

Pry up thy faults with this great lever, Will!
However deeply bedded in propensity,
However firmly set, I tell thee, firmer yet
Is that vast power, that comes from Truth's immensity.

Thou art a part of that strange world, I say!
Its forces lie within thee, stronger far Thau all thy mortal sins and frailties are;
Believe thyself divine, and watch and pray.

There is no noble height thou can'st not climb;
All triumphs may be thine in Time's futurity
If whatsoever thy fault thou dost not faint or halt,
But lean upon the staff of God's security.

Earth has no claim the soul cannot contest;
Know thyself part of the eternal source,
And naught can stand before thy spirit's force;
The soul's divine inheritance is best.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

A Queer Italian Custom.

Would you like to hear of a queer thing that would have been done to you if you had been born a little Italian instead of an American? Then I will tell you about it.

Now, you don't remember your baptism, but your mamma does. She made with her own hands the dainty little dress that you wore that day; it was the prettiest, the most exquisite of all the whole drawer full. She wondered with every stitch how the baby would act during the service. Whether he would cry and get red in the face when the strange man would take him, and so make all the people laugh; or whether he would be a regular little gentleman and every lady would say "the darling!" No, you don't remember much about it yourself, I fancy.
And whether you screamed with fear so that all the people became fidgety and eager to have the ceremony over; or if you behaved in such a manner that all they declared you were a little dear and too sweet. I don't know but your mother does, and she will tell you all about it if you ask her. She was very nervous about you that day; ask her if she wasn't.

But you remember when your little baby brother or sister went through the same ceremony. They took you to church, too, and you wondered what it was all about. The little thing you hadn't made up your mind whether to love or hate (for nobody noticed you after he came) was dressed in his sweetest slip and was carried up the long aisle to the altar, where the minister took him and said something you didn't understand; at the end of it he sprinkled water on the tiny head.
You wondered how it felt and didn't see what good it did, anyway, and thought that perhaps it wasn't so nice after all to be "the baby."

Now, if you and that same baby were Italians you would have been baptised too, but in a very different way. There is an old church in the city of Florence known as the "Baptistry," and all the children born in that city are christened there. This church has existed for more than 1100 years, some people say. Long ago baptisms took place in it only twice a year, so many of the children were 4 or 5 months old before their christening. Now it is the custom in that country, as well as in this, to have the ceremony performed when baby is but a few months old.

The Italian priest receives the child from the nurse's arms. First he breathes in the little fellow's face, then sprinkles a good deal of powder in his mouth—enough to choke an American baby. Then he waves his hands back and forth over the child, afterwards oiling him under the chin and at the back of the neck while repeating some strange words.
Now it is time for the baptismal font to be opened, and the baby to be placed on the edge, where he will stand perfectly straight, like a little soldier—ready to receive the shower of water which is not sprinkled, but literally poured over the baby. Then he is rubbed and rubbed by the big priest, powdered again by an attendant and passed to the godmother. He throws a splendid silk christening robe over the child who, poor dear, must be very much bewildered by this time.

At one of those Florentine christenings, the great poet, Dante, of whom you will one day hear if you haven't yet, saved from drowning a little child who had fallen into the font. In doing this he broke one of the small basins which surround the altar, and thus greatly disgraced himself. For so sacred are the holy vessels that the loss of a child is of small consequence compared with the breaking of one of them.

You wonder how a baby a few days old can stand up, perfectly straight? Here is the secret. He is dressed in swaddling bands (you have heard about them from the Bible), something that American children never wear. From the chest to the tips of the toes they are bound tightly in these bands, which are not removed until the child is six months old. Then they are taken off. The legs are very, very neat, because of never having been exercised at all. It seems to us, does it not, a very foolish custom? but they probably think it is just as queer that we do not make little stiff bundles of our children. I can't imagine a baby who doesn't kick and scream, but perhaps he gets so angry when he feels like kicking and finds he can't that he screams twice as loud. I'll risk a baby to make a fuss in one way if he can't in another, won't you?—Margery Daw.

The Way a Woman Reads a Newspaper.

She takes it up hurriedly, and begins to scan it over rapidly, as though she were hunting for some particular thing; but she is not. She is merely taking in the obscure paragraphs, which, she believes, were put in the out-of-the-way places for the sake of keeping her from seeing them. As she finishes each one, her countenance brightens with the comfortable reflection that she has outwitted the editor and the whole race of men, for she cherishes a vague belief that newspapers are the enemies of her sex, and editors her chief oppressors. She never reads the head-lines, and the huge telegraph heads she never sees.
She is greedy for local news, and devours it with the keenest relish. Marriages and deaths are always interesting to her, and advertisements are exciting and stimulating.
She cares but little for printed jokes unless they reflect ridicule on the men, and then she delights in them, and never forgets them.
She pays particular attention to anything enclosed in quotation marks, and considers it rather better authority than anything first-handed. The columns in which the editor airs his opinions, in leaded bifalutin, she rarely reads. Views are of no importance in her estimation, but facts are everything. She generally reads the poetry. She doesn't always care for it, but makes a practice of reading it, because she thinks she ought to.
She reads stories, and sketches, and paragraphs indiscriminately, and believes every word of them. Finally, after she has read all she intends to, she lays the paper down with an air of disappointment and a half contemptuous gesture, which says very plainly that she thinks all newspapers miserable failures, but is certain that, if she had a chance, she could make the only perfect newspaper the world has ever seen.

Beware of the Men.

If a girl lets a man kiss her at the garden gate in the gloaming she may as well allow the same privilege upon the front porch in the glare of the noontide sun, according to Ella Wheeler Wilcox. It is the mistake of a life time, says Mrs. Wilcox, to give a man any liberty which you would not want known, and to expect him to keep the matter secret.
The exceptional man will sometimes hide the indiscretion of a young girl whom he believes spoke or acted from ignorance; but the average man in the highest, the same as the lowest walks of life, boasts of his success with foolish women, and the rendezvous, the letter, the embrace, or the souvenir which she has given him, thinking it will never be known to others than themselves, is shortly the matter of gossip among a dozen people.

Women hide their secrets far better than men do. They fear the censure of the world too much to share their errors or indiscretions with confidantes. But men are almost invariably vain and proud of their conquests, and relate their achievements with the fair sex to one or two admiring friends. They may not use names, but let the incidents once be told, it is an easy matter to discover the personages if one is at all curious to do so.

The only way to keep men from betraying our indiscretions is not to commit them. I once made these remarks in the presence of several ladies, and one of them replied, "that she was glad she had never been acquainted with the class of men I knew." At the same time that lady's name had been used lightly in a club-room not a week previous, and her indiscreet actions had been commented on by "the class of men" she did know.

"The Blue Hen's Chickens."

Everybody knows that natives of Delaware are called the "Blue Hen's Chickens," but not one in a hundred can tell you why they are so called. The epithet is said to have had its origin in the following:

One of Delaware's most gallant fighters in the war of the Revolution was a Captain Caldwell, who was notorious for his fondness for cock-fighting. He drilled his men admirably, they being known throughout the army as "Caldwell's gamecocks." This same Caldwell held to the peculiar theory that no cock was really game unless its mother was a blue hen. As the months wore away Caldwell's men became known as the "Blue Hen's Chickens," a title which only increased their respect for the old game-cock captain. The nickname became famous, and after the close of the war was applied indiscriminately to all natives of the "Diamond State."

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats

When We Are All Asleep.

When He returns and finds all sleeping here,
Some old, some young, some fair and some not fair,
Will He stoop down and whisper in each ear,
"Awaken!" or for pity's sake forbear,
Saying, "How shall I meet their frozen stare
Of wonder and their eyes so woebegone?
How shall I comfort them in their despair
If they cry out, 'Too late! let us sleep on!'"

Perchance He will not wake us up, but, when
He sees us look so happy in our rest,
Will murmur, "Poor dead women and dead men!

Dire was their doom and weary was their quest.

Wherefore awake them into life again?
Let them sleep on untroubled—it is best."

—Robert Buchanan.

Origin of "Illinois."

I frequently read disquisitions upon the names of western states and rivers in which the writers strive to show new and strange definitions. Not long since, I saw a compilation concerning the state of Illinois, which showed that the word Illinois had a very great variety of meanings in various Indian languages, all of which seemed to me to be entirely fanciful. If you will permit a suggestion I will state what appears to me to be the origin of the name.

There are in the Spanish language a very great number of words derived from the original Latin form. But a few of them have been changed. Some words that in Latin begin with the letters pl, in Spanish begin with the letters ll.

It is familiar to all writers, that, in western Texas, Captain John Pope, afterward major-general, surveyed and staked out a line of road through to the Rio Grande. The plains over which the road was surveyed afterward became marked upon the map as the "Llanos Estacados." In the army I had a companion who had been a member of that surveying trip, and he explained to me the name as meaning "The Staked Plains," saying that there was a dialect in Spain that pronounced the letters ll the same as pl. This man was a fluent Spanish speaker, and had lived in Spanish-speaking countries for several years, besides serving in the regular army. There may be some doubt about the special dialect to which he referred.

Shortly after receiving that information, nearly thirty years ago, I saw an old map of the United States, and across the place where Illinois now stands, were marked the words "Llanos Indians." These were the Indians of the plains, and the name came from the early Spanish settlement.

In the year 1800 the province of Louisiana was ceded by Spain to France, from whom we obtained it. The Spanish pronunciation of the word llanos might probably be represented in English by the word el-le-ah nos.

The following is a list of some of the Spanish words, with their Latin, French and English equivalents, showing that the word llanos is from the Latin, for a plain:

Latin.	French.	Spanish.	English.
Planus	Plaine	Llano	A plain
Plenus	Plein	Lleno	Full
Pluo	Pleuvior	Llover	To rain
Ploro	Pleurier	Llorar	To weep
Pluvia	Pluie	Lluvia	A shower

There is but a very small transition from the Spanish pronunciation passing up, as it did, through the French, and then converted into English. The name of Illinois, if so derived, is "plains," and the term is very significant, because there is no state in the Union that is leveler than the state of Illinois. It is vastly more level than either Iowa, Nebraska or Kansas. The latter state has variations of over 3000 feet in its levels, and is mountainous as compared with Illinois. Its vast inland prairies, inhabited by Indians, very properly gave to those Indians the name of the "Llanos" Indians. Hence it is reasonable to believe that the word Illinois is of Latin origin, and has no derivation whatever from Indian languages.—E. F. Ware in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

How Names Grow.

It is currently related in New Bedford that several generations ago a ship was wrecked near there and only one boy saved. As they did not know his name, they called him Johnny Crapaud, and the descendant of this boy was Congressman from Massachusetts, Hon. Mr. Crapo.

To these may be added the case of Judge Poland, of Vermont, of whom the story is told that his family were Poles, and bore an unpronounceable surname; they were called the "Poles" and the "Polanders," so that the name gradually crystallized into "Poland." There is also the name common in the south, "Dabney," which is supposed by the aristocratic owners to be a corruption of the French, "D'Aubigne," and probably first imported by some noble Huguenot exile.

All readers of Walter Scott are familiar with the village of Lasswade, near Edinburgh, the home of his early married life.

When there was nae brig to cross the Esk river,
On Jenny's braid back they a gaed thegither;
For Jenny was honest, stout, sober, steady,
She carried the Laird, she carried his Leddy,
When he was richt seated, the doggie first gaed,
Then waving his stick he cried, "Jenny, lass, wade!"

An Ancient Race.

The Guanches, the inhabitants of the Canary islands, are said to be the remnants of the ancient race who, 10,000 years ago, peopled the drowned continent of Atlantis. They are reported to have been strong and handsome, and of extraordinary agility of movement, of remarkable courage, and of a loyal disposition; but they showed the credulity of children and the simple directness of shepherds. So tall were they that the Spaniards speak of them as giants, and their strength and endurance were so great that they were conquered by strategem, but not by force. They ran as fast as horses, and could leap over a pole held between two men five or six feet high; they could climb the highest mountains and jump the deepest ravines. Their endurance as swimmers was so great that they were accustomed to swim across the nine-miles strait between the Lancerote and Graciosa; having no boats their method of fishing was to strike the fish with sticks, or catch them in their hands while swimming. The skulls, which are preserved in the museums of the islands, show marked cerebral development, the frontal and parietal bones being well developed, and the facial angle good. In the early days of the conquest, before rapine and murder had done their vile work, the Guanches are spoken of as being musical and fond of dancing and singing. These arts, together with those of basket weaving and pottery making, were a few relics of a great and remote civilization, and were preserved in the same way as if Europe were submerged the shepherds of the Tyrol, the Alps and the Pyrenees would preserve the national airs and village dances of their respective countries. The Guanches were, it is supposed, but the mountain shepherds of a submerged world. Though so strong, physically, the Guanches were, nevertheless, a very gentle race; they rarely made war on one another, and when the Europeans fell into their hands they did not kill them, but sent them to tend sheep on the mountains. So tame were the birds in this happy land that when the Spaniards first landed they came and fed out of their hands. To kill an animal degraded a man; the butcher was a reprieved criminal and an outcast, and lived apart, and his assistants being supported by the state. No woman was allowed to approach the shambles, and in such horror was killing held by these gentle giants that no man could be ennobled until he had publicly declared that he had not been guilty of killing any animal, not even a goat. Their standard of morality was high; robbery was almost unknown among them, and drunkenness not yet invented.

He Was Under Cover.

There was one feature of the fight between the seventh cavalry and the Sioux at Wounded Knee which indicates in the most unmistakable manner the effect of modern firearms on the defensive, and which is, as far as I know, without a parallel in history. After the fight was over and the Indians had been killed or captured, the cavalry set to work to bury the dead. Suddenly a shot was heard and a horse fell, wounded.

The troops were puzzled to know where the shot came from, but their mystification was soon ended by a puff of smoke from the top of a chimney-like rock on a neighboring bluff, the ring of rifle ball followed by the whip like crack of a Winchester. An Indian shot through the shoulder had managed to drag himself to the rock and was firing upon the troops as fast as he could pull the trigger in his disabled condition. A squad was detailed to silence him, but so well was he covered that not a shot could reach him, while his bullets were sent to all parts of the battle ground.

The fact was finally recognized that the solitary wounded Indian with his Winchester completely dominated the field, and that it would cost half a dozen lives to dislodge him. As it was not considered worth while to go to this expense, the only thing to be done was to march off. The regiment accordingly withdrew, having been fairly driven off by one wounded man. I know of no similar incident in authentic history.

A Six-Foot Bell.

The largest bell in America is that of Notre Dame Cathedral, Montreal, which hangs in the south tower. It is six feet high, eight feet seven inches in diameter, and weighs 24,780 pounds. It is ornamented with images of the Blessed Virgin and St. John the Baptist, together with emblems of agriculture, commerce, and industry.

It was cast in London, and bears this inscription in Latin: "I was cast in the year of the Christian era 1847, the two hundred and second since the foundation of Montreal, the first of Pius the Ninth's pontificate, and the tenth of the reign of Victoria, Queen of England. I am the gift of the merchants, the farmers, and the mechanics of 'Ville Marie.'" In the opposite tower hangs a clime of ten bells, the smallest weighing 897 pounds, the largest 6,011 pounds; total, 21,695 pounds.

Plutarch says Lucius Paulus, conqueror of Perseus, last king of Macedonia, was the author of the famous old proverb, "None but the wearer knows where the shoe pinches."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Human nature is generally selfish, grasping, domineering, tyrannical. Greed is the story of human ambition at the present day; indeed, it has always been so, and is always greater than patriotism. The brightest genius, if stricken with poverty, has a poor chance in the struggle for advancement in the political world. The power and influence of wealth steps in to favor those whom they desire to elevate to the high political station. It is rare indeed that patient merit receives the consideration of the powerful as against their favorites. It is this element exerting its influence in all matters of the government that constitutes a menacing danger to free institutions. A poor man with ambition and patriotism, but without the influence of the power of wealth stands a very limited chance for the gratification of an honest ambition. This is the fault of our present system of politics. We may not be believers in what is called idolatry, but at the same time the majority worship idols just the same as the heathens did of old. They had their idols of gold and silver, and we have our idols of gold and silver—and what sacrifices do we make to those idols. The rich man transgresses the laws of decency and morality, and averts criticism by holding up his idol of gold or silver. Women bow down before these idols, even when held by the most unscrupulous of men. Men and women are not rated by the hearts within their breasts, nor by their culture, genius or attainments, but by their idols of gold or silver. No questions are asked how they became possessed of their riches—it is all sufficient if they are so possessed. The courts, the law, the juries, the merchant, in fact all bow down to these idols. Is it not time for manhood to assert itself and destroy these idols which are rapidly making true ambition and true patriotism a mockery in our government. We know worthy men of brains and ambition, who, when their names are mentioned for some post of political honor, are promptly cast in the shadow of these idols, that others who bear their glitter, though less worthy, may become senators, judges, or other important officers of the state or nation. That infernal institution, "The Pull," which is the demon servant of these idol bearers, must be destroyed before ambition and patriotism can command proper recognition.

The manager of the funded debt commission is arrogating to himself such importance and so much power, it might be well to advert to the fact, that this august body exists only at sufferance. In reality, all its legal functions have been abrogated through its zeal to acquire more power, and a broader field of operation. The constitution of 1879 prohibited all such commissions which assumed to have municipal powers, or in any way interfered with taxes or revenues, or in any wise exercised municipal functions. The funded debt commission was tolerated only from the fact that it was a body prior to the adoption of that constitution. When the amendment to section 6 of the funding act was passed in 1887, and the amendments, so-called, to sections 1, 5, 7, 8, 10 and 11 were adopted in 1889, the abrogation of that commission was made complete. All the original sections were repealed, which the legislature had the right to do, but in attempting to bestow additional powers by these, so-called, amendments the legislature exceeded its power. The Supreme Court of this State has repeatedly held that this class of legislation is special, and therefore the "law" under which the commission is acting is unconstitutional and void. In the latest cases on this question it certainly appears that the alleged amendments to the funded debt act of 1872, having been passed subsequent to the adoption of the constitution of 1879, are in direct conflict with the organic law. This being the fact, it might be well for that august body to call a halt, before the city is entangled into any of the "new plans" formulated through that agency. Any taxpayer has the power to set the machinery of the law to work to enjoin this commission from any further action.

The Chicago anarchists have again proclaimed their infamous purposes. The men who are engaged in the abuse of the American principles are chiefly foreigners, the unwelcome intruders who do not value the beneficent rights conferred upon them by our liberal institutions. They are the ones who are crowding the American workingmen out of employment, fill our jails and almshouses, and continue to threaten our land with riot and bloodshed. These ignorant and debased people come here under the freedom of citizens and at once proceed in their efforts to overturn our grandly liberal institutions. It is difficult to understand why people who never had any freedom at home should bear such animosity to the freedom of America. This howling mob of ingrates, who can scarcely make themselves understood in the language of Americans, and who are grossly ignorant of the spirit of freedom, are bent upon the destruction of law and government. It may become necessary for the administering of some more forcible and impressive lessons to these ingrates.

The uniformity of laws in the several states of this union is a "consummation devoutly to be wished." There is a necessity for simplicity and an abandonment of idle technicalities. How supremely absurd it must appear when we contemplate that we have a different code of laws for each state. While we are a people of one nation, having uniform coinage and customs duties and postal facilities; governed by the same national executive, legislative and judicial bodies, we have forty-two different sets of laws, full of conflicts and inconsistencies. We might profit by the Code Napoleon, which is less bulky than one of our codes, yet has applied to the government of empires. The hardship and lack of uniformity is especially patent in marriage and divorce laws; what is permissible in one state may be construed as a crime in another. The immense volume of law reports that is published could be greatly reduced if there was a uniform system of laws. While it might be impossible to make an absolutely uniform system, there could at least be a much greater harmony than now exists. When we find a supposed precedent in the decision of some other state, an examination of the constitution or statutes of that state discloses an entirely different condition; thus what appeared to be a case in point proves quite the contrary. There is no good reason why a better degree of harmony might not be attained.

It was a wise provision in our organic laws, national, state and municipal, to have the separate departments of government—legislative, executive and judiciary. The grand idea was to have the system so arranged that neither one of these departments should encroach upon the other, thus protecting the citizens' rights completely. If it should be held, however, by the court of dernier resort that the judiciary can, at will, select grand and trial jurors, presumably in accord with the mind of the court selecting them, it might be very dangerous in its results. This would be too great an encroachment on the other departments of government, and the rights of the citizen would be correspondingly limited to the mere whim and power of the court. The founders of our government never intended such to be the case. While there might be no abuse of such a power, there is an opportunity for arbitrary and despotic power. True it is, there has been a vast amount of corruption in our jury system, but it does not warrant despotism. The people can always be relied upon to ultimately regulate such evils in the proper avenues of administrative government.

There are rumors upon rumors concerning the Pope and Rome. It is certain, however, that the Pope will not be satisfied with anything short of the restoration of his temporal independence. Italy cannot grant that restoration without admitting that the king representing the Italian people is a usurper in Rome. Rome will not be given up save to superior force. Italians—and ninety-nine out of every hundred are catholics—are determined that Rome shall continue to be the capital as long as Italy retains her place among the nations of the earth.

Only the wise people know the credit that should be accorded to a primary school teacher. The general impression seems to be that it does not require much ability or education to conduct a primary school. There never was a greater mistake. Skill, patience, a thorough knowledge of human nature, is requisite for this teacher. "Lift your hat reverently," says the New York Recorder, "when you pass the teacher of the primary school. She is the great angel of the republic. She takes the bantling fresh from the home nest, full of pouts and passions—an ungovernable little wretch whose own mother honestly admits that she sends him to school to get rid of him. This lady, who knows her business, takes a whole carload of these little anarchists, one of whom, single-handed and alone, is more than a match for his parents, and at once puts them in a way of being useful and upright citizens. At what expense of toil and patience and soul weariness! Lift your hat to her!"

There is no sight so truly pitiable as that afforded by a rising family of children under the guardianship of an ignorant mother. We would be understood in the use of the term ignorant, as wishing to convey the picture of a mother whose maiden days were devoted to the acquirement of fashionable accomplishments, to the exclusion of solid mental culture and acquirements. The woman who reigns the queen of the ball-room is very seldom found capable of being the governess of her own children; and the time spent at soiree and rout will be bitterly regretted when age brings experience and consequent remorse for the evil she has inflicted and her incapacity to discharge properly the interesting and important duties of her station, when it was her natural duty to be at once an instructor and example. The maiden who casts aside her book for the cotillion will never win the love and esteem of a sensible man; and should she select a partner for life among her partners in the dance, she will find, when it is too late, that her choice has been as unfortunate as the place where she first attracted his notice was injudicious. We look with pain upon that young wife who enters upon her second era with fashionable ideas of society. Her first era has been devoted to the attainment of certain rules and systems which are scarcely pardonable in the girl, certainly censurable in the wife and criminal in the mother. The following remarks by Hannah Moore so forcibly express our views on the subject that we give them in lieu of anything farther from ourself: "When a man of sense comes to marry, it is a companion he wants, not an artist; it is not merely a creature who can paint and play, sing and dance; it is a being who can comfort and counsel him—one who can reason and reflect, and feel and judge, and discourse and discriminate; one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joys, strengthen his principles and educate his children. Such is the woman who is fit for a mother and the mistress of a family. A woman of the former description may occasionally figure in the drawing-room and attract the admiration of the company, but she is entirely unfit for a help-mate to a man, or to train up a child in the way it should go."

THE TRAPPER TRAPPED.

The antelopes led me a long chase, so I was eager to get to camp, for it was very dark and the forest was full of dangerous animals. I continued my way until I thought it must be near morning, but no signs of camp yet. I was weary and footsore, hungry, and so thirsty! My lips were dry and parched, and my throat could not have felt worse had melted iron been poured down it. Just as the thirst became almost intolerable I espied the dim outlines of a tree but a short distance ahead. How my drooping spirits revived; for in that region a tree is almost a sure indication of a water-course. Forgetting my fatigue I quickened my steps and was soon drinking my fill from the little creek. Oh, how delicious! now invigorating! One cannot imagine the exhilarating influence of a draught of water. It is a pleasure so exquisite that no one knows when one is satisfied.

Feeling much refreshed I sat down for a moment to "compare notes." I had traveled far enough, I was sure, to have reached camp. If such was the case I was certainly out of the way, and perhaps going further and further all the time. It could not be long till morning, and feeling sure that I was "off the track," I thought it best to remain where I was until daylight. Seating myself by an old sycamore I leaned back against its smooth body. I did not intend to sleep, but my eyes closed in spite of me, and when I awoke the night had passed. The gentle breeze was that blowing when I fell asleep had increased to a gale, heavy black clouds rolling up from the south and big drops of rain were already falling. I cast my eye about for a shelter, but saw nothing that offered greater inducement than the old tree by which I had been sitting. Hugging close to its trunk I awaited the coming tempest.

The wind rose higher and higher. The great white limbs of the sycamores which lined the banks of the creek on either side were twisted to and fro, and now and then a crash told plainly that some one of them had yielded to the fury of the storm. I was all the while on the lookout, for no one could tell which one would go next. Suddenly the tree against which I was leaning trembled and crackled and the ground began to heave under my feet. I jumped for my life and escaped that peril, but another awaited me. The huge tree in its descent struck a little sapling that stood near, partially uprooting it, and bending it to the earth. Before I was aware I was caught, thrown to the ground and pinioned there as in a vise. The little tree lay just across my breast, fast by a few remaining roots at one end and the giant sycamore at the other.

The pressure did not seem heavy, at least not painfully so, but it was sufficient to hold me firmly down upon my back with the rain beating in my face, and, worse than all, the trees falling around me. The tree seemed hardly larger than my wrist, and I thought of my knife to cut it. It was in the sheath at the back of my belt, and consequently under me. I reached first one side, then the other, but I was held too close to the ground to get it without digging away the soil. I commenced with my hands, and after an hour's work I got my hand upon the sheath. It was empty. Instinctively I turned my head and there it was, not six feet from me, but beyond my reach. It might have been as many miles for all the good it was to me. I puzzled my brain to devise some means to get it within my grasp, but all my yankee ingenuity could not surmount the difficulty. There was no other way but to dig myself out, and I went at it with a will. I worked away until the flesh of my fingers' ends was nearly worn off, yet it seemed that I was making but little progress. And then my time was limited to a few hours. The storm had ceased and the sun, which was shining brightly, had long since passed its meridian. Full well I knew my peril if I should be forced to spend the night in that helpless condition, and I resumed my digging, though with but little hope of being able to free myself before the darkness came on. Then I was so nearly exhausted and my hands were so sore that I was obliged to rest every few moments.

During one of these intervals I heard a slight rustling among the leaves and looking up saw a most welcome sight. It was the professor's faithful dog, Jack. He bounded toward me, licked my face and hands and jumped about me with every demonstration of joy at finding me. I had supposed, when I first saw the dog, that some of my companions were with him, but this proved not to be the case. Then, of what use is he, only as a companion and a sentinel? He could not release me. Ah, couldn't he? He could bring me the knife. I had often seen him, at his master's command, carry different objects and lay them at his feet. Would he not do the same for me? It was worth a trial.

"Jack, go bring it," said I, patting him on the head and pointing to the knife. Away he bounded and brought a stick. Again and again I sent him, but with the same results. Once more I made the trial.

"Go get it, Jack. Get the knife." Away he went again. Another stick—no, it's the knife. Ah! he drops it and again takes—the stick—no, thank God! the knife is firmly between his teeth, and he laid it in my hand.

If there was not some "tall" whittling within the next half hour and a fervent "thank God" as the little sapling parted, then my name is not Max Munson.

Once more upon my feet, I found that I had received more serious injuries than I had supposed, but I managed to reach camp, which was not more than a mile distant, just as my companions came in from their search for me.

THE THREE WISHES.

There was once a wise emperor who made a law that to every stranger who came to his court a fried fish should be served. The servants were directed to take notice if, when a stranger had eaten the fish to the bone on one side, he turned it over and began on the other. If he did he was to be immediately seized, and on the third day thereafter he was to be put to death. But by a great stretch of imperial clemency the culprit was permitted to utter one wish each day, which the emperor pledged himself to grant, provided it was not to spare his life.

Many had already perished in consequence of this edict, when one day a count and his young son presented themselves at court. The fish was served as usual, and when the count had removed all the fish from one side he turned it over and was about to commence on the other, when he was suddenly seized and thrown into prison, and was told of his approaching doom. Sorrow-stricken, the count's young son besought the emperor to allow him to die in the place of his father, a favor which the former was pleased to accord him.

The count was accordingly released from prison and his son was thrown into his cell in his stead. As soon as this had been done the young man said to his jailers:

"You know I have a right to make these demands before I die: Go and tell the emperor to send me his daughter and a priest to marry us." This first demand was not much to the emperor's taste; nevertheless he felt bound to keep his word, and he therefore complied with the request, to which the princess had no kind of objection. This occurred in the times when kings kept their treasures in a cave or in a tower set apart for the purpose—like the emperor of Morocco in these days; and on the second day of his imprisonment the young man demanded the king's treasures.

If his first demand was a bold one, the second was not less so; still, an emperor's word is sacred, and having made the promise, he was forced to keep it, and the treasures of gold and silver and jewels were placed at the prisoner's disposal. On getting possession of them, he distributed them profusely among the courtiers, and soon he had made a host of friends by his liberality.

The emperor now began to feel exceedingly uncomfortable. Unable to sleep, he rose early on the third morning and went with fear in his heart to the prison to hear what the third wish was to be. "Now," said he to his prisoner, "tell me what your third demand is, that it may be granted at once and you may be hung out of hand, for I am tired of your demands."

"Sire," answered the prisoner, "I have but one more favor to request of your majesty, which, when you have granted, I shall die content. It is merely that you will cause the eyes of those who saw my father turn the fish over to be put out."

"Very good," replied the emperor, "your demand is but natural and springs from a good heart. Let the chamberlain be seized," he continued, turning to his guards.

"I, sire," cried the chamberlain, "I did not see anything; it was the steward."

"Let the steward be seized, then," said the emperor.

But the steward protested with tears in his eyes that he had not witnessed anything of what had been reported, and said it was the butler. The butler declared that he had seen nothing of the matter, and that it must have been one of the valets. In short, it turned out that nobody could be found who had seen the count commit the offense, upon which the princess said:

"I appeal to you, my father, as to another Solomon. If nobody saw the offense committed, the count cannot be guilty and my husband is innocent."

"Let it be so," said his majesty. "Let him live; though I have put many a man to death for a lighter offense than his. But if he is not hanged he is married. Justice has been done."

In the Valley of Death.

"I visited 'The Valley of Death' when on the island of Java three months ago," said Lieut. Leon Bancroft when talking to a Chicago Tribune reporter. The lieutenant is connected with her majesty's service in India and registers from Calcutta.

"The place is called the Valley of Death," explained the officer, "on account of the deadly fumes there. But the natives cannot account for the poisonous odors, nor has their presence ever been explained. The deadly place is about thirty-five feet below the surrounding ground, looks like the dry bed of a stream, and is about one mile in circumference. As I approached the place I noticed a suffocating smell, and was attacked with nausea and dizziness. A belt of this fetid atmosphere surrounds the valley. I passed through it, and in purer air was permitted to view the awful spectacle—for it was awful. Before me I saw scattered all over the barren floor of the valley skeletons of men, wild hogs, deer and all kinds of birds and small animals. The entire bed of the valley is one great rock, and I could not discover a crack or crevice in any place from where the poisonous fumes came. The hills surrounding this desolate strip are covered with vegetation; and although the neighboring mountains are volcanic, they do not emit sulphurous odors or present any indication of a recent eruption.

"There is no apparent cause for the strip of deadly fumes surrounding the valley. After I passed through it I became bolder and approached the edge of the deadly place. I was anxious to reach the bottom of the valley if possible, but was afraid to make the attempt, as I had been warned to give the place a wide berth. I determined, however, to see what the fumes smelled like, and started to descend. My pet Irish terrier was with me, and as soon as he saw me step over the side of the bank he rushed down ahead of me. I endeavored to call him back, but was too late. As soon as the little animal reached the rocky bed below he fell over on his side. He continued to breath for ten minutes. I don't believe I was ever nearer death's door than I was at that time. Four or five times I was tempted to rush down to rescue him, but I subsequently learned that such a move on my part would have been certain death. For ten minutes I suffered the agony of seeing my dog die, and then turned and fled from the spot. While there I saw a bird fall a victim to the deadly fumes. It evidently intended to fly to the bottom of the valley, but before it reached the ground it fell dead. I don't believe it lived half a minute after entering the deadly atmosphere.

"No one has yet been able to explain the cause of the fetid emanations from the earth, the natives say, and so many lives have been sacrificed in attempting to explore the valley that they have determined to keep away from the spot forever."

Didn't Lose Much.

The recent death of Mr. C—, a well-known publisher, recalls the following incident: One day a gentleman named Fleming called on Mr. C—, and both being members of the same society the conversation drifted in that direction.

"You were not at the last meeting," said Mr. C—to Fleming.

"No," replied the latter; "I was unavoidably absent. I have lost my wife."

Now, Mr. C—, who was somewhat deaf, failed to hear the last remark, and said, emphatically, "Well, you didn't lose much!" referring, of course, to the meeting of the society.

When Miss C—, who was present, explained the situation, her father was overwhelmed with shame, and made most humble apologies. Fleming understood at once, and had no thought of being offended, as Mr. C— was known to be scrupulously polite and tenderly considerate.

The oldest newspaper published in England was established in 1662, by Nathaniel Butter. The oldest paper in France was commenced by Theophrastus Renaudot in 1632, in the reign of Louis XIII. The first Scotch paper was dated January 8, 1656. The first Russian paper was published in 1703. The first in North America was the Boston News Letter, dated April 24, 1704. It was half a sheet of paper, twelve inches by eight, two columns on a page. B. Green was the printer. It survived till 1776.

"I sh'd think after your paying that newspaper feller $10 to write a speech for you agin the corporations, that you would 'a' either delivered it or got your money back." "I did better'n that," answered the Hon. Hayes Seed. "I traded it to the president of the P. D. Q. & N. G. railroad for an annual pass."

EVENING.

BY A TAILOR.

Day hath put on his jacket, and around
His burning bosom buttoned it with stars.
Here will I lay me on the velvet grass,
That is like padding to earth's meagre ribs,
And bold communion with the things about me.
Ah me! how lovely is the golden braid
That binds the skirt of night's descending robe!
The thin leaves, quivering on their silken threads,
Do make a music like to rustling satin,
As the light breezes smooth their downy nap.

Ha! what is this that rises to my touch
So like a cushion? Can it be a cabbage?
It is, it is that deeply injured flower
Which boys do flout us with; but yet I love thee;
Thou giant rose, wrapped in a green surtout.
Doubtless in Eden thou didst blush as bright
As these, thy puny brethren; and thy breath
Sweetened the fragrance of her spicy air;
But now thou seemest like a bankrupt beau,
Stripped of his gaudy lues and essences,
And growing portly in his sober garments.

Is that a swan that rides upon the water?
Oh, no, it is that other gentle bird
Which is the patron of our noble calling.
I well remember in my early years
When these young hands first closed upon a goose;
I have a scar upon my thimble finger
Which chronicles the hour of young ambition.
My father was a tailor, and his father,
And my sire's grandsire—all of them were tailors.
They had an ancient goose—it was an heir-loom
From some remoter tailor of our race.
It happened I did see it on a time
When none was near, and I did deal with it,
And it did burn me—oh, most fearfully!

It is a joy to straighten out one's limbs,
And leap, elastic, from the level counter,
Leaving the petty grievances of earth,
The breaking thread, the din of clashing shears,
And all the needles that do wound the spirit,
For such a pensive hour of soothing silence.
Kind Nature, shuffling in her loose undress,
Lays bare her shady bosom; I can feel,
With all around me; I can hail the flowers
That sprig earth's mantle; and you quiet bird,
That rides the stream, is to me as a brother.
The vulgar know not all the hidden pockets
Where Nature stows away her loveliness.
But this unnatural posture of the legs
Cramps my extended calves, and I must go Where I can coil them in their wonted fashion.

—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

There's pitch in the voice, and that's why some singer's notes stick.

The uglier a show manager is the more he insists upon having his picture printed on all the bills.

Theaters are most common in the United States, where there are about sixty-five to every million inhabitants.

Five hundred theaters have been burned down all the world over in the last one hundred years, entailing a loss of about four thousand lives.

The once well-known contralto of Beecher's church, Antoinette Sterling, has become a Quaker, and recently electrified the silent audience of a first-day meeting by singing "O, Rest in the Lord," while the elders were waiting for an inspiration.

From the Galveston News we obtain the following reminiscence of Adah Isaacs Menken: General Geo. F. Alford recently contributed some interesting reminiscences of his school-boy days in primitive Texas, including several incidents in the school-lives of the famous Texas beauties, Augusta Raguett, Lucy Holcomb (now Mrs. Governor Pickens of South Carolina), and Marcellite Thorn, the mother of Lady William Gordon Cumming of London. He now contributes the following interesting sketch of another of his school-mates, one of the most famous women of modern times—Adah Isaacs Menken: It is not generally known that this extraordinary woman, the sweet songstress, the famous actress, the charming poetess, the goddess of beauty, the eccentric, wayward, daring genius, was a native of Texas, born and reared in the old Spanish pueblo of Nacogdoches. The writer was her schoolmate, and knew her well in the halcyon days of her innocent and lovely girlhood, when she was considered, par excellence, one of the most beautiful, accomplished and fascinating women in all the wide world. For years she held at her feet in resistless enchantment the most noted men of two continents, and was the favorite toast in palace, bazar and club in all the capitals of the world. It is doubtful if any woman ever taced a camera so often. At least 250 different likenesses of her were in existence a few years ago, the collection being owned by Henry Gilsey, the wealthy owner of the Gilsey House, Hermann's and Fifth-avenue Theaters in New York, and probably could not be tempted to part with them for their weight in gold. Two of these pictures, indeed, he considered as priceless as "the books of the Sybill," for they would bring any sum demanded from either of the men whom Europe holds in the highest esteem—Charles Swinburne, the poet, and the younger Dumas. Swinburne posed with her before a Parisian photographer, and the elder Dumas is represented in one of the photographs with the curly head of the beautiful actress affectionately reposing on the shoulder of the great novelist. She was the first, the cleverest and the greatest of all American actresses who found liaisons and sensational exploits the keystone to fame and fortune. She was brilliant, handsome, daring, irresistibly magnetic and endowed with extraordinary mentality and amazing power, either on or off the stage. As a girl she was an exquisite beauty, with pearly teeth; dark, wavy hair, large, lustrous, laughing eyes, and matchless, rich, red lips; dimples that chased each other over her fair, fresh face, and a voice that rivalled in melody the song of the birds when they circle around in the bright, glad sunlight in the early blushing spring morning. Her first matrimonial adventure was with Alexander Isaacs Menken, whom she married in Nashville in 1859, at the age of 24. Then followed in successive rotation numerous legal and irregular alliances with the great giant pugilist, John C. Heenan (better known as "The Benicia Boy") whom she passionately loved, and to whom she bore a son; then R. H. Newell, the "Orpheus C. Kerr," of old-time journalism, who was as brilliant as his wife was fascinating and erratic; then the morose, wealthy and cultivated gambler and passionate lover, James Barkley; then—but it is difficult to follow her erratic career through the intricate mazes of the altar and divorce courts; but after turning America and Europe topsy-turvy with her affairs with the most illustrious men of both continents, her last conquest was a veritable king of one of the smaller German royalties, with whom she contracted a morganatic marriage. Swinburne was one of her warmest admirers. Charles Dickens, the greatest of novelists, often sat at her breakfast table, praised her literary skill and edited her poems, which were published in Europe in half a dozen different languages. She gave dainty breakfasts, dinners and suppers, the lavish cost of which never entered her mind, and Charles Reade, Oxenford, Swinburne, Fechter, Dickens, George Sand, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Hamilton, the Duke of Wellington, D'Israeli, Earl Derby, Jenny Lind, Wratts, Phillips, Boucicault, Prince of Wales, Thiers, Gambetta, the elder Dumas, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Carlyle and other brilliant literary lights, whom she held in willing captivity by her seductive personality, esteemed themselves happy in being her guests. In London, which she held captive in silken meshes, she had her own splendid team, with liveried coachman and footman, and a horses head surmounting four aces, was her crest when she drove within the very sanctified shadow of Parliament house and Westminster Abbey. At the Gaieties, in Paris, her receipts for one week reached the enormous sum of 350,000 francs, and royalty itself graciously applauded her, in the sacred presence of Napoleon III and Princess Jerome and Lucien. Indeed, Eugenie's jealousy was a subject of comment at all the fashionable clubs and rendezvous.

Book Chat.

Dickens pictured 1125 characters in the books that he wrote.

Ten thousand Moslem students attend the university of the Great Mosque of El Aga, in Cairo.

Oliver Goldsmith's grave in the Temple churchyard, London, has been cleaned of weeds, and the name re-cut on the tombstone.

In her new book Manuela (the Duchess d'Uzes) makes her hero fall overboard into the Pacific ocean on one day from a ship that anchors in a Spanish port on the next.

John Strange Winter (Mrs. Stannard) having written a novel and called it "Justice," discovered that Mr. Herbert Spencer had already used her title. The philosopher permitted the retention of the name on condition that it should appear as "Justice: A Story."

Robert Harrison, who has been librarian of the London library for more than 34 years, has had a remarkable opportunity to meet and know personally many of Great Britain's greatest men and women. Among his acquaintances have been Thackeray, Lord Lytton, Charles Reade, George Eliot, Carlyle and Gladstone.

The production of books is now carried to an extent unknown in the past, and there is every reason to suppose that the rate of increase will be maintained. As only a relatively very small number of these can be used by any one person, and as the best should, of course, be preferred, every means which tends to cultivate our critical faculties should be encouraged. One with no literary discrimination left among the ever-increasing masses of printed matter is certain to fall a victim to intellectual mal-assimilation and inanition.

A few weeks ago a Boston editor received a letter from somewhere in the wild and woolly west, addressed Elizabeth Barrett Browning, in his care, he having reprinted one of her poems which had attracted the writer's attention. This instance is now surpassed, for the other day a Boston publishing house, which had recently brought out an edition of "The Complete Angler," received a letter addressed to Izaak Walton, Esq. It was from a clipping bureau, informing that gentleman that his book was attracting considerable attention, and requesting to be allowed to send notices from all papers in the United States and Canada.—New York Sun.

Professional Chat.

Gladstone delivered his maiden speech June 3, 1833.

It has been keenly said that a good sermon is not one that the people judge, but one which judges the people.

You can cheat most people some of the time; you can cheat some people most of the time; but you can't cheat all the people all the time.—Abraham Lincoln.

If heresy hunting is to continue after the manner now in vogue, the brainy ministers of the Presbyterian and all churches will simply have to stop thinking and preaching.

"Married flirts," of which so much are heard in these days, should remember what the poet Willis said of them. "Flirtation," said he, "is a circulating library in which we seldom ask twice for the same volume."

The Supreme Court of Michigan has decided that intelligence is no bar to serving on a jury, even in a murder trial.—Kansas City Star. Unfortunately the lawyers in the case have something to say as to who shall serve on the jury.

Judge Field, of Kansas City, caught a lawyer bullying a witness the other day and quietly remarked: "Gentlemen, if any one is deliberately insulted in this court-room I will not fine him for resenting it. This court will not further protect a man who gives an insult."

Jay Gould and Mr. Ingalls entered active life about the same time. The former walked down Wall street with a patent mouse trap. He set it and came near catching the earth. "After thirty years of untiring toil," says Ingalls in one of his lectures, "I, on the other hand, am a statesman out of a job."

"That was a strange will that old Jackson made," said one friend to another, referring to a wealthy citizen who died not long ago. "Why strange?" replied the other. "Why, he left his money to the bartenders." "He did? I thought he left it to his sons." "Well, so he did, nominally, but the bartenders will get it all."

Scarce had I captured my M. D., and hung my modest shingle,

When a maid I chanced to see made all my pulses tingle;
And when my malady grew worse, on careful diagnosis,
I found—'tis hard to tell in verse, a case of die—o'know—sis,

I did as any other man—prescribed an introduction,
And soon I came to look on Ann with chronic heart affection.

At last I ventured to propose, and tell my tale pathetic,
And she consented to the dose—she is my Ann—æsthetic.

Herbert Spencer was once advised by his physician to live for awhile in a boarding-house, in order that he might be rested mentally by the light, cheery and brainless conversation at the dinner table. He took the advice, but did not stay long. A lady who was accustomed to sit next to him at dinner was asked her opinion of the house, and spoke of it generally with favor. "But," said she, "there's a Mr. Spencer here who thinks he knows something about science and philosophy. I have to correct him every night."

Daniel Webster once told the following anecdote, as illustrative of the fine distinctions on which we build our judgments: A tailor being examined in a capital case in which Webster was engaged was called upon to prove that he made a certain coat for the criminal. On cross-examination he was asked how he knew the coat was his work. "Why, I know it by my stitches, of course." "Are your stitches longer than those of other tailors?" "Oh, no!" "Well, then, are they shorter?" "No, they are no shorter." "Is there anything peculiar about them?" "No, I do not think there is." "Then how do you dare come here and swear that they are yours?" This seemed a poser, but the witness was equal to it. Casting a look of contempt upon the examining lawyer, the tailor threw up his hands, and exclaimed: "Mercy on us! As if I didn't know my own stitches!" The jury believed him, and Webster said they were right.

Girls, says Marie, writing in Music and Drama: Don't believe implicitly everything he tells you when he is wooing you. Don't let him win your love too easily; men do not like that; they would rather have a little trouble to gain you. Don't worry the life out of him by asking, "Why do you love me?" He does not always have an answer for you. Don't bother him too much about your hats and gowns; a man likes to think you dress to please him, but he has other things to talk about. Don't ignore the fact when he wears a new necktie; if a man has a tender spot of vanity it is generally his tie.

NOTES.

We hear of the various cures for drunkenness, but the real genuine cure is to stop drinking, and stay stopped.

It is more than probable that the next Speaker of the House of Representatives will be some one who was in the confederate army.

If the hands are rubbed on a stick of celery after peeling onions the smell will be entirely removed. Onions may be peeled under water without offense to eyes or hands.

Kaiser Wilhelm has invented a pudding, the formula of which has been duly published. It is not stated that he proposes to get it into the vitals of his enemies—but Willie is sly, as everybody knows.

It is said that it requires two years to make a bottle of champagne. We can drink it in two minutes, but it often takes more than two days to get over the effects—if we are to believe the evidence of the experienced.

The English papers accuse the United States of "bullying" Chili. How about the "bullying" process by the British towards China? Our island neighbors evince a perpetual hatred to America and American institutions. With them everything done by our government is wrong.

A colored preacher has located hell, and of course it is down. His idea is that volcanoes, oil and gas wells are the output of hell, and that some day his Plutonic majesty will emerge through one of these avenues and claim his own. Our gas-well committees had better keep a sharp look out.

So thrifty have the farmers of Missouri become that a southwest man grafted a tomato vine into a potato vine in order that two crops could be grown on one vine. Not to be outdone in an effort to lift a mortgage from his farm, a Centralia man crossed his bees with lightning bugs so they could see how to work by night.

Governor Markham, following the President's Thanksgiving proclamation, has fixed November 26 as the day for returning thanks for the bounteous blessings we have. No matter what apparent misfortunes occur, there is always something to be thankful for. In California, particularly, there is abundant reason for thanksgiving.

An Englishman has a "system" of playing the bank at Monte Carlo, and he has won fabulous sums. The great advantage of a system is that it stays by its owner. At the end of his gambling career that Englishman will still have his system with him. This is more than can be said of anything else he now has, including his watch, his self-confidence and his clothes.

Lord Salisbury has again announced with reference to England's foreign policy, "that there is not a single speck of cloud upon the horizon foreboding danger to the peace which prevails." This confirms the impression that what some of the European correspondents need is a little bichloride of gold treatment. England's course in the Chili matter would deserve a little more emphatic treatment.

Bob Ingersoll says he would give a divorce to every man whose wife had violated her contract, and to every woman who wanted one. If Ingersoll's idea should prevail in this state there would be a splendid opportunity for the application of the doctrines announced by Gertrude Atherton, wherein wives could take on or cast off the marital relation at pleasure. The great agnostic and Mrs. Atherton evidently agree in this matter. By the way, what is the necessity, under such conditions, to go through the useless formality of marriage at all?

To the teacher is committed the training of the body, the development of the mind, the arousing of the dormant faculties of the child. Character-molding, the inculcation of noble ideas, the development of the individual, the making of future citizens are all within the province of the teacher. In fact, not only the welfare of the individual pupils, but the very destiny of our republic is contingent on the conscientious and successful performance of the duty of the teacher. When we consider the grave responsibility so vested in teachers, we are discouraged to find that, with numerous exceptions, the teachers do not meet the requirements so imposed.

The people of this city are very anxious to have the work on the new post office building proceed as rapidly as possible. While we favored the Ione stone, and still favor it, there is evidently not an adequate supply that meets the requirements of the specifications. In addition to this, during the winter months the stone cannot be taken out and delivered. This being the case, there is no good reason for delaying the work on the building, when other stone of as good, if not better, quality can be obtained. The department at Washington should permit a deviation from the specifications to the extent of allowing other stone to be used in order to hasten the construction of the much needed building. We understand that Congressman McKenna has been addressed on the subject, and as the post-office appropriation was championed by him, he will undoubtedly act so as to hasten the work of construction by the adoption of other stone than that from Ione.

A. J. Rhoads, "Frank," as he is familiarly known, has been a very sick man. For a number of days his life was despaired of, but his iron constitution and wonderful will and recuperative powers have baffled the grim destroyer. His many friends will be delighted to learn of his rapid recovery. An incident of his critical illness shows the characteristics of the man: It was during the period when the hope of his recovery was nearly gone, when he managed to secure a refreshing sleep. When he awoke he felt so much better that he remembered having some fine cigars in the house when he was taken ill. He called "Tillie," that is his wife, and said, "Tillie, where are those cigars I had awhile ago?" Mrs. Rhoads having received the orders of the physicians not to allow him to smoke, replied evasively, "that she did not know where she had put them." "Why don't you say that you don't want to get them for me?" said Frank. "Well," said Mrs. Rhoads, "the truth is, the doctors don't want you to have them." "Oh," said Frank, "to hell with the doctors, I want a smoke." It was evident that his indomitable spirit served him well in the crisis; and when a man who had barely escaped the grave, wanted to smoke, it was a sure sign that he was not ready for the undiscovered country.

A Good Word for the Extravagant.

I think upon the whole I rather like extravagant people. If I had to take my choice between a person who spent money lavishly or one who saved it up strenuously for a possible rainy day, with no happy medium between the two, I would link arm with the spendthrift, and go off on a happy-go-lucky lark. Folks who are always looking out for a fortune that may never come and laying by nest-eggs for occasions that may never materialize are stupid folk to have around. They are like Webster's dictionaries as a basis for reading; they no doubt embrace the possibilities of all the wit and wisdom in the world, but I will take my alphabet in more versatile and attractive form. I would not for a moment decry prudence, or run down caution, but too much of either of those most excellent attributes in any individual make-up would be like a pudding made entirely of dough without plums or sweetening. A suitable regard for to-morrow is an excellent thing to cultivate, and a reckless expenditure of money for the mere gratification of the appetite cannot be too severely censured; but there are grades of folly, and the generous, free and easy, live-as-you-go fellow may be allied in a certain measure to a fool, but he is only fifth or sixth cousin, and I would rather hold that relationship than maintain the same kinship with a prig. Next time you have a Christmas present to make or a birthday to remember don't pinch a penny for the wife you love, the daughter you are proud of, or the girl you adore; just sweep out the cash and make an extravagant outlay. I am sick of your "useful" presents, such as underwear, umbrellas, hosiery, and shoes! Give a jewel now and then, or a lovely picture, or a costly trifle in lace, that by its very extravagance shall show how much your heart outweighs your head.—Chicago Herald.

A Layman as Pope.

Constantine II, who was a layman, filled the papal chair for thirteen months (767-768), succeeding Paul I and being followed by Stephen IV. His name is not included in all catalogues, as he was not regularly chosen, but was elevated to the apostolic seat by his brother Toto, duke of Nepi, who compelled George, bishop of Præneste, very reluctantly, to consecrate him. Soon after the ordination George fell sick and became so infirm that he never afterward sang mass; and his right arm was palsied.

A year after Duke Toto was assassinated Constantine was deposed (August 6, 768), and Stephen lawfully elected. Not long after this Constantine, with some of his adherents, was seized by a band of ruffians and deprived of sight. His humiliation was completed by a synod of bishops assembled in the church of St. Saviour (April, 769), which unanimously condemned him and decreed "that no layman or person of any order should be raised to the papedom except by passing through the regular orders, and that all which this Constantine had sanctioned in ecclesiastical affairs and divine worship should be performed anew except baptism and holy unction.—American Notes and Queries.

A teacher gave out words for analysis. "Bank-note" was one of them, and the teacher's astonishment may be imagined when one young lady brought the following unique analysis: "Bank-note is a compound, primitive word, composed of 'bank' and 'note.' 'Bank' is a simple word, meaning the side of a stream; 'note,' to set down. 'Bank-note,' to set down by the side of a stream."

EDITORS THEMIS:

In your last issue the following extract from the pen of "Margery Daw," appears as a description of the manner in which a child is baptized at the baptistry in the city of Florence:

The Italian priest receives the child from the nurse's arms. First he breathes in the little fellow's face, then sprinkles a good deal of powder in his mouth—enough to choke an American baby. Then he waves his hands back and forth over the child, afterwards oiling him under the chin and at the back of the neck while repeating some strange words. Now it is time for the baptismal font to be opened, and the baby to be placed on the edge, where he will stand perfectly straight, like a little soldier—ready to receive the shower of water which is not sprinkled, but literally poured over the baby. Then he is rubbed and rubbed by the big priest, powdered again by an attendant and passed to the godmother. He throws a splendid silk christening robe over the child, who, poor dear, must be very much bewildered by this time.

It would be difficult to find a more perfect parody of one of the most solemn rites of the Catholic church. At the said baptistry in Florence, I have assisted several times. And the baptisms differed not one whit from those administered elsewhere in our day by the church in all lands.

The priest does not receive the child from the nurse's arms, for it is held throughout by the godfather or godmother. The priest "breathes in the little fellow's face" to signify the new spiritual life which is to be breathed into his soul. No powder "is sprinkled into the child's mouth;" but a grain of salt, emblem of wisdom, is put there. There is no waving of hands back and forth over the child. As athletes for the arena were of old anointed, so is the new Christian to be prepared for the good fight. This is described by the writer as "oiling him under the chin and at the back of the neck." Can she have forgotten that kings, priests, and prophets were anointed under the Old Law; and that in the New, as ordered by the apostle St. James, the sick are to be? The shower of water "literally poured over the baby," is pouring water three times on the forehead of the child. Baptism by sprinkling, or by pouring, or by immersion, is equally valid; and each has at times obtained in the church. The rubbing and rubbing "by the big priest, powdered again by an attendant," is a pure myth on the part of the writer. The christening robe thrown over the child is emblematic of the purity of soul begotten by baptism.

It is difficult to see what purpose the writer can have in sowing broadcast such a travesty of one of the most solemn rites of the church which numbers millions of adherents among English-speaking peoples. Probably it is most charitable to think and say that not knowing catholic teaching, the author describes what was seen by her untutored eyes. The readers of Cardinal Newman's works will recall an equally absurd description of Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament by a Methodist missionary. Apologizing for this long trespass on your space, permit me to be respectfully yours,

MONSIGNOR T. J. CAPEL.

A Remarkable River.

On the African shore, near the gulf of Aden, and connecting the lake of Assal with the main ocean, may be found one of the most wonderful rivers in the world. This curiosity does not flow to, but from, the ocean toward inland. The surface of lake Assal itself is nearly 700 feet below the mean tide, and it is fed by this paradoxical river, which is about twenty-two miles in length. It is highly probable that the whole basin which the lagoon partly fills was once an arm of the sea which became separated therefrom by the duning of loose sand. The inflowing river has a limited volume, being fullest, of course, at high tide, and has filled the basin to such an extent that evaporation and supply exactly balance each other.

The Nizam of Hyderabad, who rules over what is probably the last stronghold of feudalism in the world, is the most extravagant of earthly potentates. He is said to spend $10,000,000 a year, and has a collection of jewels worth three times that amount, including the biggest diamond in the world. He is a handsome man, of oriental aspect, still under 30, an eager sportsman, and one of the most daring tiger-takers in the east. He is forbidden by the law of the land to marry, but has a harem of 500 concubines.

Gamblers' Suicides.

"If we could but obtain accurate statistics, we should find that gambling was of all vicious habits, not even excluding hard drinking, the one which most predisposed its victims to suicide. Yet," continues this writer, "one does not quite see at first why gambling should so greatly predispose to suicide. The gambler prima facie ought to be a man trained by his life to bear ill luck with fortitude." This, of course, is true only if there be nothing in the very conditions of his life secretly disintegrating that fortitude. Let us see. It is probable that an intelligent jury will always account for the gambler's suicide by supposing that, ere he consummated the awful deed, he had come under the resistless control of temporary insanity. Hence we must try to discover those facts in the gambler's inward history which lead to this insanity. I believe they are of two classes, according as we study his experience in the light of ethical or of psychological and physical laws. In the region of moral consciousness I do not think we need seek far for the cause of the insanity. The loss of the man's whole possessions by gambling must work upon him, like a sudden accident upon a drunken man—it awakens him. And now, as he looks at the result of his career, at the obligations he has ignored, the relatives he has wronged, even the riches he has lost in pursuit of the gambler's passion, only one word can rise to his mind, and that is "Fool!" As he glances around the men with whom he has been gambling look at him in pity and mutter "Poor fellow!" or "Poor fool!" The very servants who have watched his ruin gaze now at one poorer than they, and call him in their hearts, "Poor fool!" I believe that this word of scorn, echoing within or without, filling the atmosphere for that man's ear, accurately describes the shame which he feels. Ashamed, crushed, ruined, despised by the associates who need him no longer, and called to no new and congenial surroundings by any human voice the wonder is not that so many become insane, but that every ruined gambler is not drawn in the hour of his awakening into the terrible vortex of insanity. The man who loses his all in a legitimate commercial undertaking retains at least his self respect, and self respect is the soul of fortitude.—Contemporary Review.

A Fool's Advice.

Never argue with an angry woman or a setting hen.

Be progressive. Those who head the parade do not take the dust.

Beware of the person who is always looking on the dark side of things. An honest man has no use for a dark lantern and a jimmy.

Eating in Russia.

The Russian eats on an average once every two hours. The climate and custom require such frequent meals, the digestion of which is aided by frequent draughts of vodka and tea. Vodka is the Russian whisky, made from potatoes and rye. It is fiery and colorless, and is generally flavored with some extract like vanilla or orange. It is drunk from small cups that hold perhaps half a gill. Vodka and tea are the inseparable accompaniments of friendly as well as of business intercourse in the country of the czar.

Russia and Sweden are the only countries in which the double dinner is the rule. When you go to the house of a Russian, be he a friend or a stranger, you are at once invited to a side-table where salted meats, pickled eels, salted cucumbers and many other spicy and appetizing viands are urged upon you with an impressiveness that knows no refusal. This repast is washed down with frequent cups of vodka. That over, and when the visitor feels as if he had eaten enough for twenty-four hours, the host says: "And now to dinner." At the dinner table the meal is served in courses, with wines grown in the Crimea and in Bessarabia, where excellent clarets and Burgundies are made and sold for from a shilling to half a crown the bottle.

It was reported that when Pompeius Silo, an officer of the greatest eminence and authority among the allies, said to Marius: "If you are a great general, Marius, come down and fight us," he answered: "If you are a great general, Silo, make me come down and fight."

Death of P. F. Dolan.

The community was greatly surprised at the sudden death of our old-time fellow-citizen, P. F. Dolan, on last Monday. No man had a finer physique and sounder bodily health than Mr. Dolan. Strictly temperate in his habits, and always careful of his health, it would seem that he would be the last man in this city to yield to disease. But the ways of Providence are inscrutable, and he was suddenly summoned to his long home. He was a kind and generous man and a devoted friend. He was very prominent in Odd Fellowship, being a member of El Dorado lodge, Vice President of the Sacramento Veteran Odd Fellows' Association, President of the Odd Fellows' General Relief Committee of this city, and Grand Marshal of the I. O. O. F. Grand Lodge of California. He was also a member of Concord Lodge, F. and A. M., and an exempt fireman.

For several years he has been the license collector of this county, which position he held at the time of his death. He leaves a wife, aged mother, a brother and sister, to mourn his apparent untimely end.

To show how little he contemplated death, Mr. Dolan, about three weeks ago, met Albert M. Johnson, who had been seriously ill, and said: "Well, Albert, I'm glad to see you out again; you had a pretty close call." Mr. Johnson replied: "Yes; but if I had your physique and sound body, I would consider that I had a lease on life for very many years." Yet that great sound embodiment of health and manhood was the first to yield to death's call.

St. Joseph's Academy.

This is to certify that we have for many years had in constant use six Mathushek Solid Iron-Frame Pianos, which have given the most perfect satisfaction, and more than any pianos we have ever used. Twenty years of extraordinary use has made very little, if any, change in their tone. We heartily recommend the Mathushek to anyone wanting a strictly first-class piano.

It has been discovered by some anonymous investigator that the man with the mild blue eye is the man for deeds of daring and general heroism, and Grant, Custer and Thomas are cited as illustrative examples. King Arthur and his Round Table knights, Norse sea kings without limit, and quantities of early German heroes might have been mentioned as additional examples; but it will be noticed that all the possessors of the blue eye have it as a race characteristic accompanying blonde hair and fair cheeks. Caesar and Hannibal, Bayard and the Paladins and all the heroes from south European countries will probably be found to have had the dark eyes that accompany the swarthy faces of the southerner. The trouble with the theory, like many others, is that it is too limited in its application.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Tom Keene will occupy the Metropolitan on November 25 and 26. Mr. Keene now stands among the leading artists on the stage. His support is said to be good.

Yon Yonsen is booked for November 27. It is a dialect personation, and the Swede is the character assumed in the role. The San Francisco engagement was a success, and the papers spoke well of the piece.

"Once let a woman or girl," said a theatrical manager, "appear in tights before the public and be told that she makes a pleasing appearance, and from that moment she has a mania for that kind of dress."

Last night Dr. Bill was given to a full house. It is one of the best comedies and companies on the road. On Thursday night the company opened the Auburn Opera House. A large delegation from Sacramento witnessed the dedication of the temple of the drama.

William J. Florence, the noted actor, died at Philadelphia on Thursday night, after a very brief illness. No artist on the American or English stage was more popular. As a man and actor he was a favorite. Florence's first great success was "Bob Brierly," in The Ticket of Leave Man. The old-time actors are fast leaving the world's stage.

Stage Definitions.

Hero—A virtuous young man who is such a fool that he walks into traps that a day-old blind kitten would avoid.

Heroine—An exemplary young woman who gets turned out of doors because she refuses to marry the villain.

Villain—The average man; only he gets found out in the last act and is either killed or sent to prison for life.

Super—A person who is put on the stage to fill up; one who doesn't know what to do and gets 25 cents a night for not doing it.

The heroine's mother—An old lady who is perpetually putting her foot in it and saying "God save our poor child."

The heroine's father—A white-whiskered party who is very, very brutal in the first act and a broken-down, forgiving man in the last act.

The villain's chum—A tough-looking fellow who aids the villain materially in the first three acts, but who gives the whole thing away before the final curtain falls.

The old home—A piece of stock scenery always shown in the last act to soft-music accompaniment, and at sight of which the hero always brushes away a tear.—Philadelphia Music and Drama.

Methodical Work.

A man who has so much to do that he will work nights and Sundays, as well as week days, is not likely to do as much in the long run as the man who rests at God's appointed times in order to fit himself for effective work between these times. Many a busy man breaks down a great deal earlier than he needs to because he insists on working when rest is his first duty. And many a man who observes God's law of the night and the Sabbath, written in man's very nature, accomplishes far more in series of years than he could have wrought with any violation of that law.

Mr. Gladstone, speaking not long ago of his own experiences in busy life, said of the high privilege of "Sunday rest": "Personally, I have always endeavored, so far as circumstances have allowed, to avail myself of this privilege; and now that I am arriving near the goal of a laborious public career of close on fifty-seven years, I attribute in great part to this practice the prolonging of my life and the preservation of my faculties."

A true man can do more in six days than he can in seven, week by week, as he can do more in sixteen hours than in twenty-four, day by day, for a lifetime.

Danger in Cold Baths.

The coldest natures take the hottest baths, and are not enfeebled by them. It is blood heated by youth or the fire of full life which likes the cool dip or spray, but beware how you have to nerve yourself to endure it. A cold bath may be a risky experiment. The rule that cold bathing is safe when followed by good reaction is not wholly sound. I recall a woman who used to take baths of the coldest well water daily and find great refreshment from them, who afterwards charged weakness of the heart and general debility to this excessive stimulus. Dr. Shoemaker says all the persons he has known who boasted of breaking a film of ice to take their baths died early, yet doubtless they felt good reaction at the time. It is doubtful if any grown person allowed free choice ever persisted in cold bathing which left a chill. It is safer to say take a cold bath only when it is absolutely delicious in anticipation and actual enjoyment.—Indianapolis Journal.

Long before London coined money, or possibly had a tower to coin it in, Winchester, under King Athelstane, possessed six mints for coining as many different denominations of metallic currency.

A New Poem by Whittier.
Between the gates of birth and death
An old and saintly pilgrim passed,
With look of one who witnesseth
The long-sought goal at last.
"O thou whose reverent feet have found
The Master's footprints in thy way,
And walked thereon as holy ground,
A boon of thee I pray.
"My lack would borrow thy excess,
My feeble faith the strength of thine;
I need thy soul's white saintliness
To hide the stains of mine.
"The grace and favor else denied
May well be granted for thy sake."
So tempted, doubting, sorely tried,
A younger pilgrim spake.
"Thy prayer, my son, transcends my gift;
No power is mine," the sage replied,
"The burden of a soul to lift,
Or stain of sin to hide.
"Howe'er the outward life may seem,
For pardoning grace we all must pray;
No man his brother can redeem,
Or a soul's ransom pay.
"Not always age is growth of good;
Its years have losses with their gain;
Against some evil youth withstood
Its hands may strive in vain.
"With deeper voice than any speech
Of mortal lips from man to man,
What earth's unwisdom may not teach
The spirit only can.
"Make thou that holy Guide thine own,
And, following, where it leads the way,
The known shall lapse in the unknown
As twilight into day.
"The best of earth shall still remain,
And Heaven's eternal years shall prove
That life and death, and joy and pain
Are ministers of love."

A CURIOUS LOVE STORY.
Mrs. Lightfoot was a widow; not by any means a "lone, lorn, widdly woman," but an ideal of bereaved femininity, dressed to perfection, and her conversation tinged with just sufficient misanthropy to appear cynical to some and to warn others that she learnt enough as Jack Lightfoot's wife to render her careful how she again entered into bondage.
Jack Lightfoot, always restless and excited, made much of everything except his wife, and when he made the mistake in the race for the Rumtipore Ladies' Plate, which cost him his life, everyone said that nobody but he would have broken his neck in so gratuitously unnecessary a manner.
In London she always enjoyed herself thoroughly, and in a modified way in the country. She was, and is now, much in request; but she distributed her favors pretty equally.
One day she had promised to go for a drive with Maj. Bittlestone. "Do you like Maj. Bittlestone?" said Maud de Villars, looking out of the window to see if the drag was in sight yet. She was under Mrs. Lightfoot's chaperoning wing for the day, and they were waiting in her drawing room.
"Yes, I do," said Mrs. Lightfoot, frankly, "he's so big and quiet."
"He's big enough," said Maud, "and I like big men;—but as for quiet!"—she shrugged her shoulders expressively—"he never even speaks to me."
Mrs. Lightfoot, perhaps, did not think that an insuperable fault in his character, for she smiled sweetly, and said: "I am sure that is not your fault, dear; and I daresay you would like him if you knew him as well as I do."
"I always think he would do very well for you, said Miss de Villars, turning and facing her chaperon. "You like him, and he has money."
Mrs. Lightfoot turned a little pink and said nothing; she often wondered if Maj. Bittlestone liked her; but in communing with herself she was inclined to admit that he sometimes carried silence to excess, and she felt doubtful on the point.
So she sat and wondered still more instead of answering, with her eyes fixed upon her trim little patent-leather shoes. She was invariably "chaussee" to perfection, which is always desirable, and when coaching, necessary. Most men notice how a woman is shod. But a coach horn interrupted her meditations.
They drove in silence down Piccadilly. The streets were crowded and the near leader was rather fresh. Half-way down St. James street, however, he broke silence. She was conscious of his deep voice saying, "Do you remember?" which was an auspicious beginning.
She was conscious that he was looking down into her eyes; then suddenly he glanced forward again and she heard the drag go on and knew that he had stopped the coach in an incredibly short distance; beyond that she cannot speak with certainty—for, though she has never confessed it, she admits to herself she shut her eyes.
When she opened them both leaders were down in a struggling heap; the wheelers and the coach were almost on them, the wheelers beginning to plunge; the grooms were running forward with dismay on their faces in evident doubt where to begin.

And Maj. Bittlestone—he was looking down at the confusion with very much the same expression of tranquil interest on his face which it had worn when addressing her; and certainly his voice was as unmoved, though a trifle louder, as he said to the groom on his left (the other was doing what he could at the heads of the horses on the ground to check their frantic struggles) "Unhook the near leader!"
The man was handy enough when he knew what to do; he unhooked the splinter bar. "Unhook the off leader!" said his master in the same serene tones; and the man ran round and obeyed. The moment it was done Maj. Bittlestone took the drag off, got his wheelers steady and backed them; they struggled, were almost down, but gamely did their work, and got the coach a few feet up the hill and themselves out of the neighborhood of the leaders' heels.
Unhurt, the leaders were on their feet in a moment, and Mrs. Lightfoot had hardly realized that all danger was over, and that she had not had another drive brought to an abrupt conclusion, when the same quiet voice remarked: "Hook on the rear leader—hook on the rear leader—let them go."
They picked up another passenger in Pall Mall, a man for Miss de Villars to talk to; she gave him a detailed account of all that had taken place, which lasted half an hour, only omitting to mention that when the horses went down she had stood up and screamed.
It was on a breezy part of Wimbledon Common with the horses swinging along at a fast trot, with Miss Villars in the middle of an anecdote which, though she intended it for the man beside her only, interested her chaperon in front quite as much, that he bent his head towards Mrs. Lightfoot and said—"Nine women in ten would have screamed; why did not you?"
Before Maud's story began she had been thinking of what Lord Rosherville had said to the butcher-boy who had driven into him three days before, while she was on the box-seat. Mrs. Lightfoot, even after three years' training in Jack Lightfoot's society, had been a little horrified; so she answered, dropping Maud from her thoughts in an instant, "Nine men in ten would have sworn; why did not you?" "I like to take things quietly," he said. "So do I."
His team was going beautifully. He shifted his reins to his right hand, and for a moment she thought he was going to put his arm around her waist. She thought he had forgotten that there was any one behind, and looked around apprehensively at Maud de Villars.
"All right," he said, with a half laugh, "I know I'm not in a dog-cart; but you know what I'm going to say."
And then he got a trifle flushed and redder, and in a voice which was a good deal louder than that in which he had spoken to his groom, he said: "Will you?"
And Mrs. Lightfoot, with all her experience and all her nerve, was so taken aback she could only smile weakly and murmur, "Won't I!"
"I haven't a notion," he confessed when they were at Monte Carlo on their honeymoon, "what I ever said to make you marry me, little woman." And the puzzled look with which he was trying to recall his flight of eloquence grew deeper as she answered sententiously:
"Unhook the near leader!"

MRS. GRAHAM'S
Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream
Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. A Parisian Tragedy.

The Paris Figaro says: A distinguished pulmonary specialist of London was lately consulted by a skeleton in appearance. After a careful examination the doctor said: "I can do nothing for you; in a month you will be dead."

With the calmness of despair the young man, aided by a servant, prepared to depart. As he was about to cross the threshold Dr. B. asked: "Are you rich?"

"A millionaire," replied the wretched man.

"Then order your coachman to drive you to the Victoria station, start for Dover by the 11 o'clock train, take passage on a steamer for Marseilles, and thence by rail to Nice. For six months—should God spare your life—eat neither bread, nor fruit, nor meat, neither drink wine, but eat cress, and only cress. The cure is doubtful, but I offer it to a dying man."

Six months later a robust young man crossed the anteroom, where a number of patients were waiting, and entered the office of Dr. B. At sight of the famous physician he rushed up and embraced him.

"Are you crazy?" asked the doctor.

"No, no; I am sane, but I realize that you have saved my life. Don't you know me? I am P., the millionaire, whom you saved from an inevitable death by your wonderful treatment. My improvement was miraculous. I am now in excellent health." And, to verify his remarks, he beat his chest with his fist.

"What!" exclaimed the astonished physician, "you are the man upon whom I experimented with cress?"

"Yes, I am he," responded the young man.

The doctor signed to his assistant to retire, and then, quickly drawing a small revolver he leveled it, and in an instant his patient fell dead at his feet.

Without a moment's delay he commenced to make a post-mortem examination. When the police arrived he was carefully examining the lungs of his victim with a microscope and studying the effects of the cress upon the diseased parts. To the officers of the law he said: "I killed this man for an immediate autopsy, to discover a mystery which may be a boon to all mankind."

Legend of Bottle Hill, Ireland.

A poor man was once driving his only cow to Cork to sell her. As he was going up the hill he was suddenly joined by a strange-looking little old man who finally induced the poor owner of the cow to exchange her for a bottle, which, according to the stranger, had magical properties. Going home he decided to use the bottle as the little old man had directed, and see what would come of it. Placing it on the table he commanded the bottle: "Do your duty!" and immediately two little beings rose out of it and covered the table with gold and silver dishes filled with food of every known variety. The next day he sold the dishes and became wondrously rich. The secret of his bottle finally leaked out, and the landlord induced the poor foolish man to part with it. Soon after this his prosperity vanished, and he was again reduced to one cow and obliged to drive her to Cork for sale. As he journeyed up the steep side of the same hill he was again accosted by the little queer-looking man, who offered another bottle in exchange for this second cow.

Returning home the poor man made the usual preparations, and then said: "Bottle, do your duty!" But instead of the tiny lads, with their gold and silver dishes, two huge fellows with cudgels arose from the depths of the bottle and fell to thrashing the whole family, presumably because the man had been so foolish as to part with his first treasure. When they had finished their task and had gone back into the mysterious confines of the curious bottle, the owner of it put it under his coat and went to the home of the greedy landlord who had taken the first bottle. That worthy personage was entertaining company, but when he heard that his tenant had another bottle to sell he forthwith admitted him. Of course, the bottle did its duty, and the landlord and his friends were beaten until the former agreed to return the original bottle. Years later, when tenant and landlord were equally rich, both bottles were broken in a row at a funeral.

An Abashed Marchioness.

A very popular but blind count lives in the Champs Elysees. Being witty and musical, his society is much sought after. He left Paris three months ago, and on his return called on a fashionable marchioness, who was preparing to go to a fancy ball. She begged to be excused, but as he had an important message to deliver he was shown in, and being, of course, blind, he was asked to take a seat in her boudoir. Gossip ensued, and during all the time the marchioness, assisted by her maid, executed the mysteries of her toilet.

Being ready to descend to her carriage, the count stated that he had been absent in London, and had undergone a successful operation for cataract, and could now see as well as the marchioness. The latter shrieked and jumped into her carriage without even an au revoir to her unwelcome visitor.

In the matter of JOHN GOULD, an insolvent debtor.—John Gould having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said John Gould is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said John Gould, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, on the 4th day of December, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated October 30, 1891.

A. P. CATLIN,

Judge of the Superior Court.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for Insolvent. 031-51

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN—TAKE Notice.—That on the 4th day of December, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. KATIE E. CLARK.

She Drew the Line.

There was an oldish couple—man and wife—crossing over on the Pavonia ferry to take an Erie train. She wanted to go out on the bow of the boat, but he refused and kept his seat in the cabin. She went out alone, but soon returned and said:

"William, the sight out there is worth seeing, and you'd better come out."

"I don't care for sights!" he bluntly replied.

"You don't, eh!" she exclaimed, as she sat down beside him. "Now you look a-her! You can pudge and pudge all you're a mind to, but you'll have to take it out in pudging!"

"Who's a-pudging?"

"You are!"

"I hain't, neither."

"Yes, you are! You wanted to buy a pair of red suspenders of a street-peddler for 25 cents and I said it was foolish. So it is. You've bin wearing a hold-back strap taken out of the harness for over thirteen years, and the idea of your gettin' up all of a sudden and wantin' red suspenders looks as if you was gittin' in your second childhood."

"I hain't as old as you be!" he testily replied.

"Well, you needn't throw that up, 'cause it won't do you any good. We've got along without red suspenders all these years, and we ain't goin' into no such extravagance now. If you want some lemonade or soda water I won't say no, though it's throwin' money away, but there ain't no use in talkin' red suspenders to me. Do you want to see the sights?"

"No."

"Then you sit right there and watch them bundles and I'll do the lookin'. You kin act up all you want to, but I've put my foot down and it's goin' to stay there."—M. Quad in N. Y. World.

Commas.

The London Journal of Education says that a Prussian school inspector appeared at the office of the burgomaster of a little town to ask him to accompany him on a tour of inspection through the schools.

The burgomaster was out of sorts, and was heard to mutter to himself, "What is this donkey here again for?"

The inspector said nothing, but waited his time, and with the unwilling burgomaster set out on his tour. At the first school he announced his wish to see how well punctuation was taught.

"Oh, never mind that," said the burgomaster. "We don't care for commas and such trifles."

But the inspector sent a boy to the blackboard and ordered him to write: "The burgomaster of R— says, the inspector is a donkey."

Then he ordered him to transpose the comma, placing it after R—, and to insert another one after inspector, and the boy wrote: "The burgomaster of R—, says the inspector, is a donkey."

It is probable that the refractory official gained a new idea of the value of "commas and such trifles."

The Diamond Snuff-Box.

The czar's snuff-box is as sacred as the imperial crown itself; no one is allowed to touch it. One of the imperial pages wagered that he would take a pinch out of it. One morning he walked up to the table which stood near the bed on which the czar still reclined and boldly took from it the majestic snuff box. Opening it noisily he inserted his fingers, and while Paul I. was watching him in stupefaction at such audacity he sniffed up the fragrant powder with evident satisfaction.

"What are you doing there, you rogue?" exclaimed the czar, excitedly.

"Having a pinch of snuff, sire. I have now been on duty eight hours, and feeling drowsy I thought it would keep me awake, for I would rather break the rules of etiquette than neglect my duty."

The emperor burst out laughing and merely replied:

"That's right enough, my lad, but as the snuff-box is not large enough for both of us you can keep it for yourself."

Some First Things.

Melons were first called canteloupes from being cultivated at Canteluppi, a village near Rome, where they had been introduced from Armenia by missionaries.

Spectacles were invented in the year 1320, but were not in general use until nearly 200 years later.

Musical notes, as now used, were invented in 1380.

Cannons were first used in the year 1342. Two centuries and seven different men claim the invention of gunpowder.

Printing was invented at Meitz, by Gutenberg, in 1450; introduced in England in 1471.

Post offices were first established in France in 1464. The first English post office was opened in 1581. The first German office in 1641.

The first coach was made in England in 1594.

Potatoes were introduced into Ireland in 1589.

The first English clocks were made in 1608.

And as she looked around she saw how Death, the consoler, Laying his hand upon many a heart, had healed it forever.

So Longfellow did write in "Evangeline." Irony! That death does console; that heart of mortal is healable from the smite! True it is, we do bow to the will of the overruling Power; an acknowledgment rather of its supremacy than of its justice. Death does not console. Time, credited with the healing of all misfortune, fails in its mission as against the calamity of death and its injustice. Years since we did read an ephemeral article written by the talented Bowman, entitled "Give us Back Our Dead"—a production that should have been preserved in the literature of our day. In it he did express the feeling of the very many. Years may pass, yet the thought of man does revert to the silent mounds in the cemetery, and to the loved ones that rest beneath them. A child—can the heart wound be healed? Has not our favorite passed away? A wife—can another fill her place and be the confidant? A mother—before her do all men bow in reverence, that her life has been one of sacrifice. A father—it seemeth different, yet in degree severe. We do appreciate the feelings of the many of our townspeople who have of late been bereaved; do feel how empty sound words of consolation. Death doth deal injustice.

George W. Chesley, a pioneer business man, died Monday evening, after a long illness. He had been prominently connected with business here since 1850. For three terms he was president of the Sacramento Pioneer Association, and was among its most popular members. We well recall the last time we met the deceased at Pioneer Hall: the afternoon of July 4th, at the annual banquet. He was much enfeebled from his protracted sickness, and it was manifest that he had a premonition that it would be the last annual gathering he would attend.

During the week death has claimed a most estimable young lady, Miss Jennie M. Anderson. It was the lot of the writer to have been a member of the same class with her in the grammar school, and in common with our fellow-classmates we shall keep in fond memory our stricken sister. In her lifework she chose a vocation which perhaps more than all others does benefit mankind and give luster to our civilization. She was a teacher, and had been for many years. The reverence in which she will be held by her pupils will remain a monument more telling for her commemoration than the stately shaft of chiseled marble.

Sad indeed, too, was the summoning of Mrs. Peter Flaherty, a young lady and the mother of interesting children. She died at a time when they did most need a mother's guidance and care.

Still another has been added to the death roll since we did write the foregoing lines. Joseph Wiseman died on Wednesday. He was an old resident of Sacramento, and in his life made many friends who do regret his death.

Sydney Smith was a pioneer Sacramentan. A worthy man. In our early history he did much to promote the interests of horticulture.

When our board of trustees hearkened to the siren strains of the bondholders, that they would generously allow the city to use the license money exacted from saloon keepers, we warned the board to beware of our enemies bearing gifts. With the aid of the funded debt commission the bondholders have only one object, and that is to enforce the utmost dollar from the taxpayers. Had our advice been followed in the past, these cormorants would never have secured such a grip upon the treasury. Had the debt commission been relegated to oblivion, our taxpayers would not have been so heavily burdened. The demand of certain bondholders upon the trustees to replace in the interest and sinking fund the money already used from the proceeds of licenses, and to desist in the future from the use thereof, other than to pay bond coupons, is evidently the latest act of this head of the debt commission. It was through him that the first threats were made, and this demand is only the result of his threat. Now, it is high time that the trustees should at least make the effort to free the water-works revenue from the bondholders' grasp. Let the board order 55 per cent. only of the net water rents placed in the interest and sinking fund, instead of 55 per cent. of the gross receipts. If the bondholders want to inaugurate a contest on this, based on a former decision of the Supreme Court rendered by a bare majority of the court, let them. We will be on the defensive, with justice and right on our side, and such judges as Paterson and McFarland with us from the start, while the judge's who decided adversely have been retired from the bench.

It is an anomaly, as peculiar as it is disastrous, that in the history of government, whenever reforms have been suggested by well-meaning men (those men, too, who most clearly see the necessity for such movements) for the amelioration of their fellow-beings—that wherever reforms or beneficial changes have been attempted, it almost invariably results in a civil upheaval or revolution that throws to the surface of the occasion, and into short-lived power, a class of men who are, by far, worse than those who have been overthrown and driven from power; and they have foisted into official importance either ignorant, tyrannical wiseacres or intollerant cranks, whose radical views on questions of governmental reform make them dangerous managers, and hence invite a return to the old system of affairs, almost before the suggested reforms have been tested. Witness the many efforts to upset the ancient systems in the governments of Europe, century after century; see the blood, ankle-deep, in the streets of Paris, a sanguinary sequel to the efforts of the naked sans coulottes as he seized the government urged to its oblivion, amid the cry of A la lanterne! and the screams of the condemned as they were hurried to the guillotine. And the result? The "Reign of Terror" such as no civilized country ever experienced, till those same reformers were in turn overthrown, by reason of their inability to manage what they had undertaken, and their refusal to allow the intelligent from their own ranks to guide the new system.

But to come to more modern events as examples of the failure of those spasmodic attempts to better existing conditions. Twelve years ago the country was aroused by the appearance of Kearnyism in the west. The times were ripe for reform, and had the movement been marshaled by intellectual ability as it was by physical force, doubtless great good would have evolved from the hatchings of the Sunday sandlot gatherings. But as usual, the evil element of the multitude prevailed, and could only be suppressed by the pick-handle brigade. The good, the sincere, the well-meaning, had but little force; ignorant, and often brutal men, were put into office, only to become more corrupt than those who preceded them, as an easy method of growing rich at the expense of the government they thought marching to ruin before they acquired power. Their rapacious anxiety to hold office pushed aside what little leaven of good was in their ranks, and one administration, with part of the state and the entire municipal government of San Francisco, aroused the state to smut them out of being at the next election. The new-born abortion was a fearful failure because the very men of honesty of purpose and patriotic in desire were kept in the rear of the movement, lest their superior merit would elevate them to official station. The intention in the beginning was good, but the leadership was in bad hands, and a failure ensued. So it was with the anti-Chinese crusade of the state a few years ago. The citizens at large were enlisted and meant well. It was in a good way to succeed, and a gradual expulsion of the Chinamen would have resulted; but the ever-present fanatic, to be found in all efforts toward reform, undertook to do too much, so that the firmest friends of the cause became disgusted and abandoned the effort, and the curse still remains. So it will forever be in all schemes for reformation, when the intelligent, the honest of purpose, the true lover of his country, refuses or neglects to take his share of the burden and consequences; he must look for and expect dire disaster and ignominious defeat.

We of California can fully appreciate the sentiments expressed by the New York Sun on the opportunities for the spread of that loathsome contagion, leprosy. Says the Sun: "'The plague spot of Asia' is known to every one who has read descriptions of the leper quarter in the city of Bokhara. In this district lepers have been permitted to marry other lepers, and the number of victims has increased until, by order of the government, marriages have been forbidden, husbands have been torn from their families, and the greatest misery has come upon the poor outcasts, who have now been bereft even of the consolation which the companionship of their unfortunate friends afforded them. Communities that have given little regard to the question of public health are waking up to the fact that the scourge of leprosy requires rigid regulation. The most appalling carelessness has prevailed in some regions where leprosy has a foothold. It is said that a leper was until recently employed as a school teacher in a West Indies island, and that lepers are still permitted to sell fruit on the highways of Jamaica. The fact that the disease has recently spread to hitherto uninfected districts shows that the world in general has an interest in an intelligent and humane restriction of the liberty permitted to the victims."

Now that Minneapolis has been agreed upon as the place for the Republican national convention in 1892, some plan should be formulated for a fitting reception of the National Editorial Association which will undoubtedly meet in California in May next, and the country press of the state should take hold of the matter and impress upon their readers the great good which will result to our state in having so important an assemblage meet within her borders. Every section of the union will be represented in this convention, and that by gentlemen who will be constrained to truthfully give their impressions of our state's resources. Our mineral and agricultural lands will be personally visited and critically analyzed by these representative men, and through their journals will be eagerly read by millions of readers throughout the United States, who will become convinced of the truthfulness of all that has heretofore been written of the wonders of California. Immigration is what is needed to build up our state, and this convention of the National Editorial Association is what will bring it; and that of a very desirable class. Committees should be organized in all the towns of the state, and invitations extended to the convention to visit their localities in order to aid them in setting forth the advantages held out by California to the homeseeker. Sacramento has always been noted for her hospitality to the stranger within her gates, and she can be relied upon to contribute her share toward the entertainment of the press association.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government Was Formed Out of Chaos.

PART XXI.

The city council met on January 2d, 1850, on call of the president. Present—Councilmen Winn, Rogers, Smith, Gillespie, Worbass and Miles.

In No. XIX of this series we referred to the fact that a communication from Governor Burnett was received concerning the raising of funds to construct a city hospital. It was ordered filed, but as the paper is lost its contents cannot now be given.

The council at this meeting accepted the resignation of Ambrose Hadly as city assessor of real estate. C. W. Coote was at that time city engineer (surveyor). He presented a bill for services as such for $361, which was allowed, but as the bill is lost the particular character of the surveys made by him cannot now be stated.

At the period of which we now write many persons were found in the city destitute of means of support; the sick were numerous, and the means of caring for them were scant. The city council, at its meeting of January 2d, appointed a committee consisting of councilmen Miles, Gillespie and Worbass to raise means for the relief of the destitute found within the limits of the city.

The council at this meeting filled the vacancy in the office of the assessor of real estate of the city, caused by the resignation of Ambrose Hadly, by the election of John A. Tutt, and assessor Hadly and his sureties were released from all obligations on the bond filed by Hadly on his election to that office.

The city council again met January 7, 1850. It received a communication from C. W. Coote, city engineer, notifying the city council of his intended absence from the city for a short time, and that he had appointed Mr. Snowden as his deputy during his absence.

The harbor-master reported to the council that he had collected the sum of $199 90, which he then had on hand; and, on motion, the report was received, and he was ordered to pay that amount to A. M. Winn, who seems to have acted as treasurer as well as president of the council.

The bills of W. Grove Deal; Brother, Center & Co., and Thomas Bamsted were received, and the bond of John A. Tutt, as assessor for real estate, was submitted and approved.

On motion of councilman Rogers, it was resolved by the Council that hereafter the secretary, Wm. Glas-kin, receive the sum of $400 per month for his services; and it was also resolved that the secretary make out for use of the council a list of all accounts allowed, or presented for allowance—giving their dates, and for what service the bills were rendered—for use of the committee on ways and means.

The city council seems to have been specially active about this period, for it again convened on the 10th of January, 1850, on call of the president, who stated the object to be that, inasmuch as the city was inundated, it was necessary, in his opinion, for the city council to take some measures for the relief of those in distress; and he presented a draft for an ordinance to be entitled "An ordinance providing for the relief of the suffering during the overflow of the city," which was read a first time, and the two other readings being dispensed with, it was passed. This ordinance is not extant, and its provisions cannot now be fully ascertained; but we can infer that relief marshals were to be appointed, with captains, authorized to act on behalf of the city, because the president then and there appointed as "captains of relief marshals," N. C. Cunningham, Charles H. Miller, E. Mekonnekin, Geo. H. Wright, B. Hadley and Barton Lee. And each councilman was, by order of the council, clothed with powers similar to those granted by the ordinance to the "captains."

Sacramento city had at this time a severe struggle for existence. It is situated at the confluence of two large rivers draining an immense water-shed, and the waters of the Mokelumne and San Joaquin rivers had a distinct influence in swelling the volume of water which annually flooded the lands in the vicinity of the city. The Sierras are high and the descent steep. The water which falls on the western slopes reaches the valley of the principal rivers in a short time. The river at and south of Sacramento is nearly on a level with the waters of the bay of Suisun. The water approaching the city is rapid, whilst on its course to the ocean the current is comparatively sluggish. The city was not located with the best attainable advice. The northern boundary of the city was the American river, and for all time the waters of that river, at the season of its flood, found an outlet across the land now occupied by the city. The general tendency of the water, after it reached the low lands, was to the south, and to protect the city from overflow it would be necessary to force that water north and west.

We have in a former number of this series shown how the city came to be located where it is, when a better site for it might have been found at Sutterville. The inhabitants of the city, in January, 1850, had but little conception of the actual state of the case. Their engineers had little or no experience in such matters and they did not estimate the rainfall on the water-sheds and compare such data with outlets to the ocean. They had invested their money in city lots, and their goods were for sale in fragile houses located on land liable to overflow. We cannot now have a full knowledge of the details of the calamities which fell upon the pioneer citizens. I, J and K streets were then from five to fifteen feet lower than now; the houses were largely of canvas, stretched on poles, and the floors were very near the ground.

About December 20, 1849, the rainy season set in with fury, a southeast rainstorm giving the citizens a new experience in California life. The streets of the city were then without paving; the soil was black, and when wet became almost impassable for loaded teams; the frail shelters scarcely kept out the rain, and communication with the mines, our main source of income, became daily more difficult, and at times impossible. The city was then intersected with large sloughs, which became impassable except by boats hastily constructed to meet the emergency. The influx of miners, driven from their claims, was great, and some of them being destitute the sick could not be well cared for. There were then three hospitals in the city—one at the fort, under the care of Wm. Grove Deal; one kept by Dr. T. J. White (who was at San Jose as a member of the assembly), and one in charge of doctors Morse and Stillman, and located at the corner of Third and K streets. The charges for treatment at this latter institution are stated in the advertisements to be: In main ward, $10 per day; in private ward, $20 per day.

The money market was then reported to be tight. Gold dust was the main currency, and for its use the borrower paid from 10 to 20 per cent. per month. The retail price of provisions was, for some of the leading articles of consumption, as follows:

Fresh pork,	per pound	-----	$ 75
Bear meat,	"	-----	$1 to 1 25
Elk and deer	"	-----	50
Irish potatoes,	"	-----	30 cents to 35
Sweet "	"	-----	40 " 50
Onions,	"	-----	1 25
Flour,	"	-----	18 cents to 20

The rain ceased between the holidays, December, 1849. The ground was, however, full of water; the sloughs were also overflowing. The water in the river receded and the people felt relieved that an overflow had been averted.

About the 3d of January, 1850, another southeast rainstorm commenced. To the inhabitants of the city it was a real calamity. The lower parts of the city were submerged by the first storm; the water flowed into the low lands through numerous sloughs connected with the Sacramento and American rivers; Burns' slough became a river. But Front street could still be used, and the main business could still be conducted along that thoroughfare, though with difficulty. The storm still continuing, the banks of the river and margins of the slough north of I street could no longer restrain the waters; the city, except a few acres near the fort, was a body of water. Most of the business houses had but one story, and this was in water to different depths. The goods were, so far as possible, piled above the water. The levee became a principal place of resort; vessels, old hulks, boats and barges, were in demand. No pen can describe the scene, and no chronicler can (or ever could) set down the individual instances of heroism and suffering brought about by the calamity. Under the leadership of the marshals appointed by the council, everything was done that could be to relieve the distressed, visit the sick and bury the dead, during the continuance of that overflow.

The weather cleared up about the 13th of January; the water ceased to rise and finally commenced to fall, and by the 20th something like order was again restored from the chaos caused by the overflow. About the 25th of January a meeting of leading citizens was called to meet at the city hall to devise ways and means to save the city from further injury from overflow. Barton Lee was chosen chairman and J. L. L. F. Warren secretary. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. R. Gelsten, Barton Lee and S. C. Hastings, and on motion the chair appointed J. H. Giles, J. S. Fowler, J. R. Snyder, B. Jennings, H. Bigelow, J. L. L. F. Warren, Sam Brannan, Thomas McDowell and T. L. Chapman a committee to examine the necessary work to be done in the construction of levees to protect the city. That committee was authorized to appoint an engineer to make surveys and estimates and to report to the committee.

The meeting also appointed Messrs. McDowell, Ormsby and Mecumken a committee to solicit funds and to commence and superintend the work.

The committees met at once and proceeded to business, making Barton Lee president and C. W. Coote secretary. H. P. Woodworth, an engineer, came before the committee and stated that he had explored a line for a levee and had made an estimate of its cost. He fixed the number of cubic yards to be put in place to be 50,874. He added that, "from the above examination and estimates, it will be seen that Sacramento can be easily protected against inundations, and that, too, at comparatively small expense;" but he did not specify what the expense would be, or the exact line of the levee. On motion of Major Snyder, a committee was appointed to wait upon the city council in relation to the subject of construction of levees, and the chair appointed H. Bigelow, R. Gelsten and J. H. Giles.

The next morning the meeting again convened, and Mr. Bigelow informed the chairman that the committee had waited upon the council and had secured the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved by the President and Council of Sacramento City, That the communication this day read by a committee of the citizens regarding the leveeing of the city be received, and that the city engineer be hereby instructed to take the necessary level and other surveys therewith connected, and to report to the Council a full statement of his operations, as well as an estimate of the expenses necessary to effect the same.

Resolved, That four committeemen be appointed, two from the city and two from the council, to act in conjunction with the city engineer in locating the proposed levee around the city.

Thereupon the president appointed H. Bigelow and B. Lee from the city, and T. A. Worbass and Col. Smith from the council, as such committee.

This matter is entered on the minutes of the city council at its meeting February 5, 1850, and will be further mentioned in a future number of this series.

Woman in the Literary World.

When one looks over the list of the literary women writing to-day, it is astonishing how successful a galaxy can be brought together. The truth comes home to one every day that women are, in reality, making more money out of literature at present than are men. For every man who makes a good living by his pen there are almost two women. Take Mrs. Burnett, and no literary man of the present day equals her income. Mrs. Humphrey Ward will make a small fortune out of her "David," whether it is a success or not. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps commands the highest prices from all the magazines. Mrs. Margaret Deland sets her own figures, and gets them, too. Sarah Orne Jewett receives as much for a short story as does the most successful male author. Anna Katharine Green sustains a comfortable home solely from the proceeds of her pen. Ella Wheeler Wilcox sells everything she writes, and could easily support herself in comfort from her work if it became necessary. Anelie Rives writes little, but what she does write and sell brings her the best prices. Maria Parloa lives on the income of her pen, and a neat income it is. Mary J. Holmes receives a larger yearly check from her publisher than does many a bank president. Amelia E. Barr is kept busy supplying stories and articles at flattering figures. "The Duchess" makes several thousands of dollars each year with her pen, while "Mrs. Alexander" does the same. "Octave Thanet" has more than she can do, at the most remunerative rates of payment; and one might go through an almost endless list of women, such as Julia Magruder, Elizabeth B. Custer, Frances Courtenay Baylor, Harriet Prescott Spofford, Miss McClelland, Mollie Elliott Seawell, Louise Chandler Moulton, Ellen Olney Kirk, Grace King, and a score or two of others.

Nothing Like It.

"Well," said a teacher in one of our public schools to a bright, persistent scholar in a grammar class, "if you are sure matrimony is an adjective, will you compare it?"

"Brother Tom, who has just got married, says it can't be compared to anything in the world," rattled off the scholar.

"Then compare it by the rule," insisted the teacher, quite good-naturedly.

"Positive, Miss," said the scholar, "comparative, Mr., superlative, Mrs."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Epitaph for an actor—Played out.

The tired actor smiles when the curtain drops, and so do a good many in the audience.

The theatrical mechanic is not quarrelsome, but he often finds it necessary to raise a scene.

Scalchi and Patti don't speak now-a-days. Scalchi even goes so far as to say she won't sing on the same stage as Patti.

Mrs. James Brown Potter and her friend, Mr. Higgins, alias Kyrle Bellew, are to sail for South Africa on December 24.

Mrs. Leslie Carter, a Chicago celebrity, is to appear in Miss Heylett, a play which is said to be not only naughty but nasty. A divorce court experience hardly fits a celebrity for anything else.

Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's memory will be kept alive, among other ways, by a musical scholarship, to establish which a large number of eminent artists have agreed to take part in a concert, which will be given in London early in the coming spring.

Rose Coghlan carries a theatrical dressing-room along her route. It is about eight feet in height and ten feet square. It is made of papered canvas and pine boards, and can be taken apart and shipped with the scenery. It is usually set up in the wings.

Dora Wiley is now singing in the Palace Theater in Boston at 10, 20 and 30 cents. She was one of the leading artists in the Carlton opera company, and is the wife of Richard Golden. Dora Wiley is a Sacramento county girl, having resided at Georgetown in this county.

She had risen several times to let a little man pass out between the acts. "I am very sorry to disturb you, madam," he remarked, apologetically, as he went out for the fourth time. "Don't mention it," she replied, pleasantly. "I am happy to oblige you; my husband keeps the bar."—Detroit Free Press.

There is a revival of the rumor that Lillian Russell, the queen of comic opera, is again about to wed. As Miss Russell has already ventured twice on the sea of matrimony it is apparent that she is not quite ready to pronounce marriage a positive failure. She may be a believer in the base-ball proverb, "three times and out."

They gazed at him with respectful awe
As he walked a-down the street,
They followed him in a little crowd
Behind his hurrying feet.
I asked the reason for the throng,
But this is all they'd say:
"He's the only man in New York town
Who isn't writing a one-act play!" —Mirror.

The Epoch tells this story of Edwin Booth: In Detroit he once took a fancy that he would no longer be advertised as "Mr." Booth. "Go to the printers," he said to his manager, "and tell them to put simple Edwin Booth on the handbills and posters." I did as I was told, and explained to the foreman of the printing office that Mr. Booth wished simple Edwin Booth put whenever his name occurred in the copy. What was my astonishment and Ted's horror next day when all the billboards were placarded with the cast of The Apostate, headed by "Pescara, Simple Edwin Booth." When I went to the printer to raise Cain I was informed that the bill had been set up strictly in accordance with my instructions, and that it was a printer's business to follow copy even if it took him out of the window.

In a London interview Mr. Augustin Daly says that his present company is the third one that he has owned. In the first company Miss Clara Morris was the bright particular star; in the second Miss Fanny Davenport shone with a light superior to all the others. Miss Rehan is, of course, the glory of the present company. She has been playing with Mr. Daly for ten years. Mrs. Gilbert and Mr. Lewis have been with the company since 1869, and Mr. Drew since 1874. Miss Rehan is quoted as saying that Lord Tennyson's new comedy will please and surprise the poet laureate's world-wide admirers very much. It is utterly different in form and expression to Lord Tennyson's other dramas. It is a story laid in green fields and shady woodland scenes. And it is a costume play in the most delightful acceptance of the word. It is enriched with a number of exquisite lyric poems which will shortly be set to music. In thus introducing songs into the text of his comedy, Lord Tennyson is only following the example set him by William Shakspeare. The poet laureate is taking the most active interest in all the preparations for the forthcoming production of the play. The costumes are to be designed in England, and the sketches are all to be submitted to Lord Tennyson before anything final is to be determined upon.

There are many people who remember better to borrow than to return books.

Book Chat.

There is no blessing that can be given to an artisan's family more than a love of books.

The poem is not as ornamental, perhaps, as the prettily ribboned waste-basket, but it generally "gets there, all the same."

"Ouida" is Louise de la Ramme. A child's pronunciation of her Christian name led the author to adopt her sobriquet.

"Montezuma's Daughter" is the title of Rider Haggard's new novel. This is the book framed during his visit to Mexico.

Libraries are as the shrines where all the relics of ancient saints, full of true virtue, and without delusion or imposture, are preserved.

Mrs. Theresa J. Freeman, a Missouri writer whose work is well known in the west, is a descendant in the seventh generation of Pocahontas, the Indian princess of song and story.

One of the earliest published works of China is the "Book of Changes." It is also the most revered, because the least understood of the nine classics. This work was written by Wan Wang in the year 1150 B. C.

Mrs. Poultney Bigelow, who is the latest New York society woman to break into literature, is said to possess $1,000,000 in her own right. Most women possessing such a fortune would rather spend their time writing checks than books.

The oldest libraries of which we have any certain knowledge are those recently brought to light by excavations among the ruins of the east. Among these are the Babylonish books inscribed on clay tablets, supposed to have been prepared for public instruction about 650 B. C. It is said by Aristotie that Strabo was the first known collector of books and manuscripts—this about the year 330 B. C.

The demon Asmodeus, who lifted up the roofs of the houses in Madrid and showed the young student of Alcala all that was going on within, has long been famous. It cannot be said that the stories which are told in the book are always of the most pleasant character; and yet, if Dr. Cleopas' experience was to fall to the lot of someone to-day it would probably result in equally strange revelations. Le Sage was a moral surgeon and a keen satirist; and human weakness, greed, hatred and hypocrisy have seldom been laid so bare as in his fanciful story.

"The Lady of Cawnpore," by Frank Vincent and Edmund Lancaster, is a romance that links the Occult east with the New east, inasmuch as the scene shifts from New York to Benares. The hero is a young clergyman, Marmaduke Allen, who is betrothed to one of his parishioners, a girl of birth and position. His religious faith is crushed by the combined influences of occultism, agnosticism and Pantheism, and he loses his fiancée, Beatrice Orme, through the tactics of Dr. Billington, his father's executor, who desires her for his son. The narrative is frequently interrupted by religio-philosophical dissertations.

Paesiello did most of his composing while lying in bed wrapped up to the ears in the bed-covers. Cimerosa is said to have received the inspiration of his most beautiful operas while in the midst of mirth and the bustle of the street. Mezerai worked on his histories only in the daytime, but always by the aid of lighted wax candles. Ampere declared that he was only inspired while standing and in motion. Descartes required perfect stillness. Cujas studied most satisfactorily while lying at full length, face downward, on the floor. Milton always composed with his head thrown far back, generally with closed eyes. Gnido Reni was incapable of inspiration unless magnificently dressed. Haydn never attempted composition without first putting on the valuable ring given him by Frederick II. The poet Mathurin always stuck a wafer on his forehead, just between his eyebrows, before taking up his pen.

No American poet, says the Philadelphia Record, ever received a more enviable compliment than one paid to John Howard Payne by Jennie Lind on his last visit to his native land. It was in the great National hall of the city of Washington, where the most distinguished audience that had ever been seen in the capital of the republic was assembled. The matchless singer entranced the vast throng with her most exquisite melodies—"Casta Diva," the "Flute Song," the "Bird Song" and the "Greeting to America." But the great feature of the occasion seemed to be an act of inspiration. The singer suddenly turned her face toward that part of the auditorium where John Howard Payne was sitting and sang "Home, Sweet Home" with such pathos and power that a whirlwind of excitement and enthusiasm swept through the vast audience. Webster himself lost all self-control, and one might readily imagine that Payne thrilled with rapture at this unexpected and magnificent rendition of his own immortal lyric.

Professional Chat.

Doctors are the ones who can afford to smile every time they see men drinking each other's health.

Justice is blind, but not so much so as the man who goes to law with the idea that he is sure to get justice.

Why is it said that the doctor pays visits, when every one knows that it is the visits which pay the doctor?

J. T. Chesney, a Natchez, Miss., lawyer, has been sentenced to serve two years in the Detroit house of correction for pension frauds.

"There is the poultice; put it on his stomach." "But I thought you said that it was his heart that was affected, doctor?" "Well, you always reach a man's heart through his stomach, don't you?"

There is a prominent doctor in Boston who insists upon his wife dusting and sweeping one room in her house every day without one stitch of clothing on. He says it is the only way to give every muscle full play.

Doctor (to first patient)—"Suffering from indigestion, eh?" "Yes, sir." "How about tobacco?" "Well, I smoke." "Ah, and you'll have to give it up." Same doctor (to second visitor)—"Stomach trouble, eh?" "Yes, sir." "How about tobacco?" "I don't use it." "Well, you'd better smoke."

"Uncle David" Gray, of Utica, whose name is pretty well known in New York state politics, and who was a personal friend of Roscoe Conkling, says that the future senator attracted attention from the very first law case he handled. Conkling was then a rosy-cheeked young man of twenty-one, and he plunged into the case with so much dash and brilliancy, and fought the opposing lawyers with so much vigor, that it nettled the older members of the Utica bar. But within a few years they had learned to respect him for his talents. Conkling was then, says Mr. Gray, as proud as a peacock and a man of indomitable will.—N. Y. World.

We are reminded, says Eugene Field, in the Chicago News, of a speech made at one time by Roscoe Conkling. It seems that in one of his communications to the senate President Hayes dilated upon what "we" intended to do. Conkling properly despised Hayes, and he saw here an opportunity for a sarcasm. "I am sure," said he, "that the senate shares my desire to get an understanding of what the president means when he uses this pronoun 'we.' There are, as we know, three classes of people who, by common consent, are privileged to use that pronoun in communication with the public. They are sovereigns, journalists and people with tapeworms. Let us ascertain, if we can, to which of these classes President Hayes belongs."

The evil repute of Halifax came to it by inheritance from Halifax in Yorkshire, England. Halifax law, as may be gathered from a letter of Lord Leicester quoted by Motley in his "History of the United States," was that criminals should be "condemned first and inquired upon afterward," a law which, in that one particular at least, resembled "Jedburg Justice." Halifax lay within the forest of Hardwick, where the law was that if a felon was taken with 13½ pence worth of stolen goods he should be tried by four firth burgers from four of the precinct towns, and if condemned by them be hanged the next day. After this proceeding had been carried out to the letter the case might be sent to a jury! Halifax is also credited with being the home of the guillotine, which the regent, Earl Morton, introduced into Scotland only to have his own head chopped off with it.

Opie Reed has been telling a good story to the "Munchausen" of the Chicago Press: It was about Dr. Collins, a friend of his. It appears the doctor had just graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Chicago, but had not made up his mind where he would locate and practice. While thinking this matter over he became interested in telegraphy, and he learned to both send and receive messages. He had a quick ear, and taking by sound was simply a delight to him. He became very expert. He finally heard of a town where they needed a doctor, and he determined to go and see the place. He was much pleased, and about decided to locate there, but he must come back to the city to make arrangements. While waiting in the depot for his train he heard the telegraph instrument tick, and he began taking the message mentally. It was the turning point in his life. The message was the final closing up of a deal that had been going on for some time, and the message revealed to the doctor the fact that a branch railroad was to be run into a certain town not far away, and that certain shops and factories were to be at once erected there. There was a caution in the dispatch to keep mum, as the owners of the property had not as yet even heard of the scheme, and they would double up on the price of the land if they knew of it. What did he do? He had some property, and knew where he could get a fairly big sum of money. He got together what cash he could raise and bought up the best part of the town to be improved. He is now worth $15,000,000. "That was luck," said Opie, "and good luck, too."

NOTES.

Our local politicians should make up a team for the tug-of-war contest. They know when, where and how to work a pull.

Brooklyn, N. Y., was threatened with a water famine. They would simply "smile" over such a calamity as that at Sisson.

San Francisco cut a very sorry figure in her bid for the national republican convention. Another wrong for the traffic association to right.

The king of Siam has a half-brother who is Prince Damrong. That's the trouble with most of those foreign princes, and our American girls are just so themselves when they marry for title. It is regretted that we can never find a prince who is damright.

I believe, if two women were cast together upon a desert island, they would spend each day arguing the respective merits of sea shells and birds' eggs, considered as trimmings, and would have a new fashion in fig leaves every month.—Jerome K. Jerome.

Convincing proof of the ability of the ancients in chemistry is the experiment with which Cleopatra entertained Antony by dissolving before him, in a kind of vinegar, a pearl of very great value (about £45,450 sterling). At present we know of no vinegar that can produce this effect; but the fact is well attested. Probably the queen added something to the vinegar, omitted by the historian.

St. Orlando's stone, which stands about a mile northeast of Glamis Castle, England had the reputation, in years past, of prophetically revealing the events of the future, either by speech or sign from itself, or inward response felt by those who invoked its aid. Maidens therefore repaired to its hallowed shrine for information as to their future destiny; and lovers plighted their solemn troth there.

The mace, the ensign of authority at present in the house of representatives, has been in use for seventy-five years. It is the third since the formation of the government. The first was stolen by the British when they burned the capital in 1814; the second was an inexpensive and temporary mace. Every day at noon, when the house meets, the mace is borne to the hall by the sergeant-at-arms and placed upon its pedestal.

The first duty of everyone is to be himself. He must think his own thoughts, have his own ideals, use his own powers. One of the defects of our education is, that it does not make one conscious of his own mind, master of himself. There is always a desire, as well as inclination, to lean on someone else. Our modern youth are not as self-reliant as they should be; more particularly is this the case with those of affluent parentage.

Earl Bulwer Lytton, son of the great English novelist, and at the time of his death ambassador to France, died in Paris November 24th. In poetic circles he was known as "Owen Meredith." He was a skilled diplomat as well as a superior man of letters. The genius of the father, in this instance, descended to the son. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton was the first among the writers of the world, and Robert held a high place in the literary world.

There is said to be a family in Grayson, Ky., four children of which bear a remarkable resemblance to snakes. "Their heads are pointed at the crown, eyes small and beady and located near the top. When excited or angry, they run their tongues out with great rapidity, exactly like a snake. Their skin is scaly and sheds off in patches, exactly the same time each year," it is reported. The parents show nothing uncommon in appearance.

Much there is of responsibility upon an attorney who defends a mortal charged with the crime of murder; it means the playing of high cards for a fearful stake—a life. There did occur in our courts the trial of August Fourgous for the homicide of his wife. He will, perhaps, never realize the narrow escape he had. His life was only saved that he had an attorney who was not daunted by what was, seemingly, a hopeless case. But meet it is to compliment Grove L. Johnson.

Some fellow, young and giddy, doubtless, travels up J street every night, after his game of pedro, and disturbs the atmosphere of his route by yelling "Bring back my bonnie to me" in a tone that must arouse all the coyotes on the grant. Will not that vagrant damsel take compassion on a suffering community and return to that forlorn swain, and not forget to accompany herself with his voice?—for he seems as much in need of that as of her comforting presence.

The youth of this city, boys especially, are growing up in the streets, with apparently no one to control or manage them, until they are not only pronounced nuisances on every corner long after midnight, but are really a dangerous element in the city. Their conduct is disgraceful, and they seem to defy the law and the police. A strictly enforced curfew law would remedy the evil. Such an ordinance was enacted a few years ago, but became a dead letter simply because the officers did not do their duty; so the law was repealed by the trustees, to save to the city the $20 per month given to the man who rang the 9 o'clock bell.

There is a splendid crayon picture of the late William Arlington, the favorite police officer, at Capt. Stevens' saloon. The work was executed by Miss Mabel Stevens, the 14-year old daughter of Capt. Stevens. The picture is true to life, and one looking upon it would think he was in the actual presence of the popular and genial officer. It would be a good idea for the police department to secure the picture and add it to the gallery of officers. Miss Stevens discloses a natural talent for art work. Among her art works is another fine picture, an oil painting of Mount Shasta, which is the best portrayal on canvas of the scenery around Mount Shasta we have ever seen.

He Bossed the President.

Abraham Lincoln was always the friend of the man who did his duty, as many a good soldier and official discovered to his lasting benefit. Mr. Chittenden, in his "Recollections," tells a story that illustrates this fact. It was when the president paid a visit to Fort Stevens, when an attack was expected upon Washington. A young colonel of the artillery, the officer of the day, was in great distress because the president would expose himself. He had warned Mr. Lincoln that the confederate sharpshooters had recognized him and were firing at him, and a soldier near him had just fallen with a broken thigh. The officer asked Mr. Chittenden's advice, saying that the president was in great danger.

"What would you do with me under similar circumstances?" asked Mr. Chittenden. "I would civilly ask you to take a position where you were not exposed."

"And if I refused to obey?"

"I would send a sergeant and a file of men and make you obey."

"Then treat the president just as you would me or any civilian."

"I dare not. He is my superior officer; I have taken an oath to obey his orders."

"He has given you no orders. Follow my advice and you will not regret it."

"I will," said the officer. "I may as well die for one thing as another. If he were shot I should hold myself responsible." He walked to where the president stood. "Mr. President," he said, "you are standing within range of 500 rifles. Please come down to a safer place. If you do not, it will be my duty to call a file of men and make you."

"And you would do right, my boy," said the president, coming down at once. "You are in command of this fort. I should be the last man to set an example of disobedience."

The president was conducted to a place where the view was less extended, but where there was almost no exposure.

Hairy, Hollow Crystals of Bamboo.

One of the most famous and fatal poisons used in Japan and Java is obtained from the bamboo. The young shoots of the cane, when they first push through the ground, are covered with fine, brownish hairs, which under the microscope appear to be bayonet-like spikes of crystals of silex, infinitely sharp, and hollow. Small quantities of these hairs administered daily in the food bring on ulceration of the whole alimentary canal, simulating malignant dysentery. The action must be of a mechanical rather than chemical nature, just as the spores of the common puff ball act upon the eyes. The bamboo crystal is greatly dreaded by all European residents of Java. A Dutch official report says that scores of deaths among European planters are due to the bamboo hairs and to the jealousy of native women, who, whenever they take a fancy to a white man, will either have him or poison him on bamboo hairs, if it takes months to accomplish the job. The infinitesimal hollow through these hairy crystals is the most remarkable thing in connection with them, they being the only known hollow vegetable or mineral thorus or crystals.

"I don't often laugh outright in the school-room," said a down-town teacher the other day, "but I have to struggle hard to suppress an audible smile sometimes. For instance: I was instructing my class one day last week in the events just preceding the revolutionary war, and after I had read and explained the lesson I began to ask questions about it. I asked one boy to name one of the causes that led to the revolt of the colonies against Great Britain. 'Tea,' he answered. That was all right, so I said to another, a colored boy, by the way, 'Name another cause.' After a pause, he replied, 'Coffee.' On the same day I gave my boys a short talk about Columbus, and then asked, 'Who can tell me the nationality of Columbus?' A half dozen hands were raised, and selecting one of my brightest scholars, I told him to answer. Judge of my surprise when he said, triumphantly, 'Dago.'—Philadelphia Record.

Horace Greeley on Debt.

Among the many good things which Horace Greeley wrote for the New York Ledger is the following vivid article on the misery of being in debt:

To be hungry, ragged and penniless is not pleasant; but this is nothing to the horrors of bankruptcy. All the wealth of the Rothschilds would be a poor recompense for a five years' struggle, with the consciousness that you had taken the money or property of trusting friends—promising to return or pay for it when required, and had betrayed their confidence through insolvency.

I dwell on this point, for I would deter others from entering that place of torment. Half the young men in the country, with many old enough to know better, would "go into business"—that is, into debt—to-morrow, if they could. Most poor men are so ignorant as to envy the merchant or manufacturer whose life is an incessant struggle with pecuniary difficulties, who is driven to constant "shining," and who, from month to month, barely evades that insolvency which sooner or later overtakes most men in business, so that it has been computed that but one in twenty of these achieves a pecuniary success.

For my own part—and I speak from sad experience—I would rather be a convict in state prison, a slave in a rice swamp, than to pass through life under the harrow of debt. Let no young man misjudge himself unfortunate, or truly poor, so long as he has the full use of his limbs and faculties, and is substantially free from debt.

Hunger, cold, rags, hard work, contempt, suspicion, unjust reproach, are disagreeable; but debt is infinitely worse than them all. And, if it had pleased God to spare either or all of my sons to be the support or solace of my declining years, the lesson which I should have earnestly sought to impress upon them is: "Never run into debt! Avoid pecuniary obligations as you would pestilence or famine. If you have but fifty cents, and can get no more for a week, buy a peck of corn, parch it and live on it, rather than owe any man a dollar!"

Of course, I know that some men must do business that involves risks, and must give notes and other obligations; and I do not consider him really in debt who can lay his hands directly on the means of paying at some little sacrifice all he owes; I speak of real debt—that which involves risk of sacrifice on the one side, obligation and dependence on the other—and I say, from all such let every youth humbly pray God to preserve him evermore!

He Was a Bit Bashful.

It is a story of a bashful young man. He was very bashful; so much so that it was a positive agony for him even to meet a young lady acquaintance on the street, and excommunicating torture for him to make a social call. Although he faithfully sent regrets in response to all the invitations he received, this did not relieve him from the onerous duty of a party call.

One evening he went to call upon a young lady for whom he had as much regard as he dared think of. He had less trouble in screwing his courage up to the sticking point, for the lady had a couple of brothers about her age, on whom he depended to relieve him of the responsibility of conversing. But he was disappointed. As soon as he was ushered into the parlor the spirit of mischief seemed to take possession of the two brothers and they excused themselves. The young man dropped into a seat, his face suffused with a four-ple blush, and began to suffer. He looked at his feet, and they seemed frightfully conspicuous. As he studied the pattern of the carpet the figures seemed to dance before his eyes. His collar suddenly became about two inches taller and threatened to saw his head off; and all the while he was racking his brains for something to say.

Finally the young lady began an interesting conversation with herself. She discussed the latest operas and books. She asked questions and answered them herself. A hysterical determination to amuse her caller took possession of her and she worked hard. The bashful young man ventured a pianissimo monosyllable once in awhile, but he still suffered. Had he heard the latest song, she asked. He replied with a shake of the head and a movement of the lips. Then she offered to play it for him. As she rose from her chair, her dress caught on a little stand which supported a Royal Worcester jar. Here was his chance to say something; and, bracing himself for the effort, he exclaimed, in a husky voice:

"Look out, there!"

That was the most extensive remark he made, and having delivered himself of it, he relapsed into his painful silence again for the remainder of the call.

Greatest Battles of History.

Burke, in his letter on "Natural Society," says that Sylla destroyed 300,000 men in each of three battles, one being at Cheronea. The Persians are said to have lost 230,000 men at Plataea. II Chronicles, xiii: 17, records 500,000 slain on one side; which, however, may not have been in a single battle. I Kings, xx: 26, tells of 100,000 men being killed on one side in a single day.

FLASHES.

Charity is often distributed amid the bugle blast.

It is always the lucky person that believes in luck.

We never look to the "smart set" for good manners.

A man must stand very high to be above suspicion.

It is easy to be a philosopher, but hard to make it pay.

There is nothing too silly these days for "society news."

In adversity true friends do not wait for an invitation to call.

The phonograph must be female—it always has the last word.

Women should learn to love one man truly, rather than a dozen just a little.

It was only a question of time for Germany to get hungry for American pork.

When a man or woman falls into contempt, it is pretty sure that they deserve to.

Conceit is almost an incurable disease; we have some badly afflicted in that way in this city.

"Bah" is partial to the kiss of brotherly love, provided it is with somebody else's brother.

Bi-chloride may be a cure for the evil of drinking; in fact, gold is usually a cure for any evil.

The man who has never made a fool of himself has lost the luxury of an opportunity; he was probably a fool to start with.

Nuptials.

Our young friends, Frank Meckfessel, Jr., and Miss Nellie Davis, have assumed the union of unions. On October 27th, at San Francisco, they were united in the holy bonds. The groom is a young business man, and the son of our prosperous fellow-citizen Frank Meckfessel. The bride is Miss Elenor Davis, sister of Winfield J. Davis. Both bride and groom were born, reared and educated in this city. Frank evidently believes that it is not well for man to be alone, and Nellie agrees with him. With two honest, loving hearts, there is no room for even a discussion of the alleged problem, "Is marriage a failure?" To the newly married couple we say: The world is yours; all you have to do is to go forth boldly and take it. Apply the homely old admonition: Stick together, love one another, share each other's joys and sorrows, be brave in adversity, faithful in prosperity, and the true object of marriage will be realized.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

Couldn't Frighten the Squire.

There comes from the town of Baldwin, says the Lewiston (Me.) Journal, a story of gruff, square-edged old Squire Thompson, one of the first settlers of the neighboring town of Cornish and father of the late Dr. Thompson, for many years a prominent physician in that part of the state. It was a local saying about Cornish that Squire Thompson had never been scared. Many plots had been laid by practical jokers, but all had come to naught.

Finally some Cornish wags made a last effort. One night Squire Thompson attended a husking at which the festivities were somewhat prolonged. It was midnight before the squire started for home, his way being by a path through the cemetery. The wags had been busy digging a big hole across this path, and as the squire proceeded home he suddenly tumbled in. At the same instant a sheeted figure appeared on the edge of the hole and exclaimed in measured, sepulchral tones:

"What are you in my grave for?"

"What are you out of it for at this time of night?" retorted the doughty old squire, as he scrambled out and proceeded on his way.

"Pride sleeps in a gilded crown, contentment in a cotton night-cap," says an old Chinese proverb; and there is a volume of truth in the sentiment. Still it is not the mere possession of wealth which produces misery, but the use to which wealth is put by its possessor. The man of generous and noble impulses who by a long course of untiring industry, backed up by fair and honest dealing, has amassed wealth may, of course, purchase the purest happiness which mankind can know by acts of charity and benevolence. So long as man makes money his slave he is safe enough; but when he allows money to make a slave of him, then at once happiness departs. So that, after all, it is not wealth but contentment that produces pure happiness; and the poorest man may be as rich, figuratively speaking, with a clear conscience and a crust as the possessor of millions.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On December 2d Skipped by the Light of the Moon will be presented at the Metropolitan. It has been many years since we saw Gourlay and the Harrisons in this little comedy. The comedy has been revised with new and catchy music.

Last Wednesday and Thursday was a season of the "legitimate" drama. Thos. W. Keene can be ranked as one of the great actors. His rendition and interpretation of Louis XI can be classed as great. Mr. Keene deviated from Sheridan's portrayal of the cruel, crafty and vengeful Louis by smoothing down the repulsively hateful character in the last act. Where other actors make the king die with that love of power so great that he seizes the crown as the dauphin is about to place it upon his head, Mr. Keene softens the hardened and cruel character. In place of seizing it, he gently pushes it towards the dauphin, showing that he has no longer his desire to retain it. There is no play on the stage that affords such a wide range of passions and crafty hypocrisy. In it is cruelty as well as courage. While endowed with cunning, the king is a victim of superstition. He has the weakness of vanity, which the village maidens play upon with profit. The actor has a grand opportunity in the character of "Louis XI," and Mr. Keene has added to its greatness. History makes Louis XI a great statesman as well as a cruel and perfidious monarch. It is related of him that during his reign France prospered greatly. He was the enemy of the rich and the friend of the poor, despite the evident romance of the cruelty to the people. We think Mr. Keene's idea of softening the character at the last a good one, and true to history, although an innovation on other actors' interpretation. Mr. Keene's "Richard" is not his best, although in line with other great actors. It is certain that an impetuous rendition of the lines of Shakspeare always produces a jar. The words and sentences are run together so, that there is not a distinct articulation of the words and sense. Mr. Keene often lets his impetuous passion render the words indistinct. He gives, however, a grand conception of the cruel monster "Gloster." In his hands the character is made to follow Forrest and Chas. Kean. We rather like Fred Warde's rendition. He is quiet and intense where Keene is tumultuous and passionate. Be it said that Thos. W. Keene belongs to the trimvirate of great actors.

Let the Babies Be Babies.

The wrong that is the most deplorable of all that is committed against the baby is forcing it out of babyhood; subjecting it to a hothouse development and depriving it of the rarest joy, the sweetest memories that could visit it when the glow of morning has faded forever from life's sky. The baby will see enough of society, if it lives; and if it does not live, it will probably be introduced into far better society than we could afford it here. Wherefore the need, then, of dressing it up in imitation of his foolish elders, allowing it to dance, flirt, eat late suppers and fancy itself a grown woman when little more than a dozen years old? Why should the mind that naturally delights in the mysteries of the woods and fields, the sports and interests of childhood, be directed to lovers, to intrigue, novels and all manner of vanities, before the moral sense is sufficiently developed to distinguish the false from the true? Why should the attention that ought to be devoted to the studies and amusements of youth be turned to the vices and inconsistencies of unmanly manhood?

He Kept Inside the Rules.

A man while fishing, suddenly fell into the water. A fellow-fisherman of benevolent aspect helped him out, laid him on his back, and then began to scratch his head in a puzzled way.

"What's the matter?" asked the bystanders. "Why don't you revive him?"

"There are sixteen rules to revive drowned persons," said the benevolent man, "and I know 'em all; but I can't call to mind which comes first."

At this point the rescued man opened his eyes and said faintly: "Is there anything about giving brandy in the rules?"

"Yes."

"Then never mind the other fifteen."—London Figaro.

Few people know the significance of the figures in playing cards. In olden times hearts represented "choirmen," or ecclesiastics, and the early cards of that suit have a cape, which in form resembled a heart. The spade was originally a pikehead, typifying the nobility of the soldiery. The artisans were represented by a stone tile, now known as a diamond. Farmers were represented by a trefoil, or clover leaf, now called a club. The four kings were originally David, Alexander, Caesar and Charlemagne, representing the four great monarchies. The queens were Argine, Judith, Esther and Pallas, representing birth, fortitude, piety and wisdom. The knaves were either knights or servants to knights.

The Three Bells.

Beneath the low-hung night cloud
That raked her splintering mast,
The good ship settled slowly,
The cruel leak gained fast.
Over the awful ocean
Her signal guns pealed out,
Dear God? was that thy answer,
From the horror round about?
A voice came down the wild wind—
"Ho! ship ahoy!" its cry;
"Our stout Three Bells of Glasgow Shall stand till daylight by!"
Hour after hour crept slowly,
Yet on the heaving swells
Tossed up and down the ship-lights—
The lights of the Three Bells.
And ship to ship made signals;
Man answered back to man;
While oft, to cheer and hearten,
The Three Bells nearer ran.
And the captain from her taffrail
Sent down his hopeful cry;
"Take heart! hold on!" he shouted,
"The Three Bells shall stand by!"
All night across the waters
The tossing lights shone clear;
All night from reeling taffrail
The Three Bells sent her cheer,
And when the dreary watches
Of storm and darkness passed,
Just as the wreck lurched under,
All souls were saved at last.

—J. G. Whittier.

"IN ONE YEAR, DOROTHY."

"Yes, there she is. Oh, Molly, we are so glad to see you. And how sweet you look, doesn't she, Dorothy?"

Half an hour later the three same girls were sitting in a pretty room in a large, old-fashioned house situated on the main street of one of the quaint old towns in New Hampshire, which has lately received the dignified title of city, much to the astonishment of the staid old inhabitants.

"The three" had not been together since their boarding school days, and the present and future of all had to be discussed.

Cecil was a maiden with brilliant color, hair as black as night, and a never-ending flow of language. Dorothy Crownshield was directly opposite in her personal appearance, but, though as innocent as a dove, much mischief lurked in the depths of her blue eyes, and a more bewitching little flirt could scarcely be imagined. Sweet Molly Percival was a simple beauty, a home girl, with no special attraction beyond her lovely eyes and beautiful hair.

"You are not too tired, girls, to begin festivities at once, are you? Senator Rice's niece is visiting him now, and we have invitations to-night to some private theatricals and a little dance given in her honor."

"Tired! Oh, no; we shall be charmed," they both said in one breath; "and tell us, Molly, shall we meet our fates?"

"Just wait and see; all the fellows are home from college, and there will be plenty to choose from at all events."

At nine o'clock the Senator's handsome parlors were filled with a gayly-dressed throng eagerly watching the doors of the spacious dining hall, which was devoted to the actors.

The three girls were ensconced in luxurious chairs, placed at precisely the best point to gain a view of the play, and soon Dorothy was completely absorbed, so much so that she was ignorant of the half-amused, wholly admiring gaze of a handsome man of eight and twenty, who was leaning against one of the folding doors.

"Oh, was not that pretty?" she turned and said to Molly; "and did they not act beautifully? How I wish I could—" and then she stopped and colored a vivid crimson, for she had caught the gaze of Jack Coolidge, who was slowly moving towards them.

"Why, what is the matter?" said Molly.

"Oh!" as she caught sight of Jack, "now, Dorothy, do be careful; Jack is the worst flirt I ever knew, and has broken no end of hearts."

Dorothy made no reply as the young man was close upon them and begging Miss Percival, in an undertone, "to render him supremely happy for at least one moment, by introducing him to that dear little fairy in blue at her side."

Molly, in her heart, was glad, for, notwithstanding his many faults, Jack was a thoroughly good-hearted fellow, as well as noble and unselfish; and if he could only fall in love with a girl like her friend, she was convinced he would prove himself to be the man she believed him to be. But she said to him in a low tone, as she granted his request: "Take care, Jack, Dorothy can meet you on your own ground to perfection."

Apparently she did, for after that Jack Coolidge absolutely devoted himself to "the pretty girl in blue."

"Well, Jack, I really believe you are hit at last," Ned Sylvester said as they rode home together after the party, and he looked curiously at his friend, who, for once in his life, was absolutely silent.

The next day a number of the young men whom they had met at the dance called on "The Three," among them Jack Coolidge, but there was no doubt in the minds of any present then or through the week that followed who it was who occupied his thoughts, for he was always at her side.

It was the last night of the week that they were to be together, and all were sitting on the piazza in the moonlight, when a carriage drove up to the door and a man alighted and came slowly up the steps. In the moonlight "the three" could see his face was ghastly white, and it was the face of Jack Coolidge.

"Good evening," he said, with a low bow. "Miss Percival, may I be so selfish as to take your friend from you on the last night for a little drive?" and he looked pleadingly at Molly.

"Why, certainly," Molly said, with a pitying look, "if Dorothy cares to go."

Dorothy scarcely dared look into the eyes which were fastened so eagerly upon her, but she answered carelessly: "Why, yes; much as I dislike to leave you girls for even a moment a ride on such a night as this would be perfection, and I cannot resist it. We will not be gone long, will we, Mr. Coolidge?"

They drove rapidly down the street, by the river, and out in the open country; then letting the reins drop loosely on the horse's back, Jack leaned back and looked at his companion, who had been as silent as he had himself. He reached out and took one unresisting hand in his while he said: "Dorothy, darling, I love you, will you be my wife?"

Dorothy made no reply, only a half smile rested on her lips.

"Dorothy, Dorothy, will you not answer? Do you not believe me? You surely do not doubt me. Oh, my darling, you do not dream what you are to me, how much you are to me, how much I care for you, what a paradise this week has been to me. Oh, Dorothy, tell me you love me or my soul will sink into utter darkness—tell me, darling," and his eyes sought hers.

"No, Mr. Coolidge, I do not love you; can never be your wife. I have never cared for any man, and I never, never shall." And she looked steadily into his eyes; but even as she did so, a mist came between her and the man whom in her soul she knew was more than life itself to her.

He turned a shade paler, but he pleaded no longer, simply saying: "You do not believe me now, Dorothy. Some time you will believe me; trust, me and know that I love you with a love that no other man can give you."

They drove home as silently as they came. "I will see you at the station to-morrow," he said in parting, and she silently bowed and ran lightly up the stairs into her little room. Then, taking off her hat and bathing her eyes, she went down into the parlor where the gay company was assembled, just the same sweet Dorothy as ever.

There were laughter and tears at the station next day, and various little tokens in packages and flowers from the gay party who came to see them off. Jack's gift was one perfect rose, in the heart of which hidden among the petals, was a tiny slip of paper, with the words: "In one year, Dorothy."

Just one year after, as Dorothy was sitting on the porch in the soft twilight, a man came rapidly up the walk and paused looking at her. "Is it my Dorothy?" he said, holding out his arms.

Dorothy started to her feet, gave one look at the man standing so close to her and then, "Yes, Jack, dear, if you can love such a bad little girl." Then Dorothy felt herself gathered into the arms of the man she loved.

"And why would you not tell me one year ago to-night?"

"Because—because, Jack, dear—oh, Jack, it was my foolish pride. My heart had never been touched by any man, and I could not endure then the thought that there was one whom I had to confess life would be empty without, and without whom I could not be happy."

"But now, darling?"

"Oh, Jack, dear," with a happy little sigh, "so many times I have been so lonesome."

Mamma: "Why did you pull that hair from mamma's head? Didn't you know that it would hurt poor mamma?" Little Innocent (who has just pulled out a gray hair from her mamma's raven tresses): "I didn't pull out no hair, mamma, 'twas only a bastin' fread."

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

Death in the Kitchen.

Trim, thou art right!—'Tis sure that I,
And all who hear thee, are to die.
The stoutest lad and wench
Must lose their places at the will
Of death, and go at last to fill
The sexton's gloomy trench.

The dreary grave!—O when I think
How close ye stand upon its brink,
My inward spirit groans!
My eyes are filled with dismal dreams
Of coffins, and this kitchen seems
A charnel full of bones!

Yes, jovial butler, thou must fail,
As sinks the froth on thine own ale;
Thy days will soon be done!
Alas! the common hours that strike,
Are knells, for life keeps wasting, like
A cask upon the run.

Aye, hapless scullion! 'tis thy case,
Life travels at a scouring pace,
Far swifter than thy hand.
The fast-decaying frame of man
Is but a kettle or a pan
Time wears away with—sand!

Thou need'st not, mistress cook, be told
The meat to-morrow will be cold
That now is fresh and hot;
E'en thus our flesh will, by and by,
Be cold as stone. Cook, thou must die;
There's death within the pot.

Susannah, too, my lady's maid,
Thy pretty person once must aid
To swell the buried swain!
The "glass of fashion" thou wilt hold
No more, but grovel in the mould,
That's not the mould of form.

Yes, Jonathau, that drives the coach,
He too will feel the fiend's approach—
The grave will pluck him down;
He must in dust and ashes lie,
And wear the churchyard livery—
Grass green, turned up with brown.

How frail is our uncertain breath!
The laundress seems full hale, but Death
Shall her "last linen bring."
The groom will die, like all his kind;
And e'en the stable boy will find
This life no stable thing.

Nay, see the household dog—even that
The earth shall take; the very cat
Will share the common fall;
Although she hold (the proverb saith)
A nine-fold life, one single death
Suffices for them all!

Cook, butler, Susan, Jonathan,
The girl that scours the pot and pan,
And those that tend the steeds—
All, all shall have another sort
Of service after this—in short,
The one the parson reads!

The dreary grave!—O when I think
How close ye stand upon its brink,
My inward spirit groans!
My eyes are filled with dismal dreams
Of coffins, and this kitchen seems
A charnel full of bones!

Why Nellie Gave the Kiss.

"A pretty compliment I heard for you the other day, Miss Nellie," I said as we started down the lake, skating the long roll. Miss Nellie's color heightened, while her eyes danced.

"A certain gentleman told me, Miss Nellie, that yours were the sweetest lips he had ever kissed."

Miss Nellie proceeded to make a great fuss.
"What an infamous story! Who ever dared —well," she continued, pouting, "I will never forgive you unless you tell me at once the man's name who had the impudence!"

I refused while we skated a mile, and then, down below the bend, relented.

"I will tell you, Miss Nellie, if you in return will—will!"

"Will what?" she said, pretending obtuse-ness.

"Will let me find out for myself."

Ten minutes later we were gliding back up the lake, skating slower now. The pout on Nellie's lips was replaced by a dancing smile.

"But, see here, she said, 'you haven't told me yet, you haven't kept your word, though
—I've kept—mine' (furious blushes here).

"Well," said I, playing my last trump card, "nobody ever said such a thing to me; but now I say it to you, and I know whereof
I speak."

The Girls of Buda-Pesth.

A correspondent writes: "In two days in Buda-Pesth I have encountered more pretty women in face and figure than in a whole month in other places. Their vivacity is also remarkable, and it is no more than natural that gallants are so numerous. Romeos and Juliets after sunset pass you at every turn.
To prim and precise individuals like myself it is positively startling to come unexpected upon two persons of opposite sexes with their arms around each other or hands tightly clasped. Somehow, when you recover your equanimity, the spectacle does not appear so shocking. However it might be with other nationalities it has not the semblance of coarseness with these people. Their demou-strations are exhibited in such a spirit of unconsciousness and of Arcadian simplicity as to be exquisitely refreshing."

Coolness Saved His Life.

Dinner was just finished in the mess room and several English officers were sitting around the table. The conversation had not been animated, and there came a lull, as the night was too hot for small talk. The Major of the regiment, a clean-cut man of fifty-five, turned toward his next neighbor at the table, a young subaltern, who was leaning back in his chair with his hands clasped behind his head, staring through the cigar smoke at the ceiling. The Major was slowly looking the man over, from his handsome face down, when, with sudden alertness and in a quiet, steady voice, he said: "Don't move please, Mr. Caruthers, I want to try an experiment with you. Don't move a muscle."

"All right, Major," replied the subaltern, without even turning his eyes. "Haden't the least idea of moving, I assure you! What's the game?"

By this time all the others were listening in a lazily expectant way.

"Do you think," continued the Major—and his voice trembled just a little—"that you can keep absolutely still for, say two minutes, to save your life?"

"Are you joking?"

"On the contrary, move a muscle and you are a dead man. Can you stand the strain?"

The subaltern barely whispered "Yes," and his face paled slightly.

"Burke," said the Major, addressing an officer across the table, "pour some of that milk into a saucer and set it on the floor here just at the back of me. Gently, man! Quiet!"

Not a word was spoken as the officer quietly filled the saucer, walked with it carefully around the table and set it down where the Major had indicated on the floor. Like a marble statue sat the young subaltern in his white linen clothes, while a cobra de capello, which had been crawling up the leg of his trousers, slowly raised its head, then turned, descended to the floor and glided toward the milk. Suddenly the silence was broken by the report of the Major's revolver, and the snake lay dead on the floor.

"Thank you, Major," said the subaltern, as the two men shook hands warmly; you have saved my life!"

"You're welcome, my boy," replied the senior, "but you did your share."

A Live Doll.

The following true story is told in the "Journal of Emily Shore."

A little girl near us was one day playing before the house when a woman appeared and begged a few pence. She had a baby in her arms, and the child was so delighted with the little thing that she asked the woman if she would sell it to her.

"What will you give for it, miss?" was the counter question.

"Half a crown."

"Very well," said the woman. "Let's see the money."

It was produced and the sale made. The little girl took the baby, carried it upstairs, and laid it on her bed, and, after she had fondled it "enough for once," scampered downstairs, calling to her mother:

"Mamma, mamma! I've got a live doll! I always wanted one, and now I've got it!"

The baby was found and the story frankly told; but, though the beggar woman was sought all over the town, no trace of her could be discovered. Meanwhile the baby's little "owner" begged so hard that it should be kept that the parents yielded, and the living doll became a household blessing.

Protection.

I believe in the doctrine of protection because the facts of our national experience thoroughly exemplify its truth. No great American statesmen, except the half forgotten leaders of the slave power, have disowned the protective system. The importers' trust and the slave trust have been alone in their hostility to that system, each for obvious reasons peculiar to itself. If the doctrine of protection is not true, our people have blindly followed a blind leadership. If the policy of protection is not wise, it indicates that the human race, outside of England, has not sense enough to take care of itself. I will not thus disparage the average common sense of our own country, nor thus discredit the average common sense of mankind.—J. P. Dolliver in American Economist.

Good Advice From Two Sources.

"Wait on the Lord and keep His way, and He shall exalt thee to inherit the land."

"Watch your hat and overcoat; the proprietor is not responsible for them."

These are the inscriptions on two placards that hang near each other on the walls of a Philadelphia lunch house.

Weighing machines and scales of some kind were in use 1800 B. C., for it is said that Abraham at that time "weighed out" shekels of silver, current money with the merchant, to Ephron, the Hittite, as payment for a piece of land, including the cave and all the standing timber "in the field and in the fence." This is said to be the earliest transfer of land of which any record survives, and that the payment was made in the presence of witnesses.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1891.

No. 42.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There is much truth in the remark made by State Superintendent Anderson in his address before the teachers' institute of this county, that he did doubt whether, with our vast improvements in buildings and apparatus, children are taught to think any better than they were when he was a young man; that he did not believe in judging a child's mental capacity by the percentage he gets on his report card; and that both parents and teachers are in too great haste to give the children an education. We did recently express our views upon the subject of crowding children, and did contend it did result in many instances in permanent impairment, and that the present system has in cases resulted in premature fatality. Unquestionably, the child should have an opportunity for reasonable physical exercise, and it should not be the years of immaturity should be harassed by the extreme mental strain, that in many instances does amount to punishment. In truth does the superintendent remark that the child of to-day is not taught to think any better than the child of forty years ago. There is too much of the artificial about the education of the present; too little of the practical. Boys, particularly, should be educated, in degree at least, with view to the avocation their inclination indicates they will follow. We have never realized the sense of the theory that to teach one all has advantage that it disciplines the mind. It does often happen that a thorough education in mathematics is of no practical benefit to one whose tastes eventually incline him to professional life; naturally, with such a mind, grammar, history and literature are the favorite studies. Different it is with one of a commercial bent.

There is no good reason for not supporting the entire republican ticket at the school election on Monday. So excellent is the nomination of the republicans for superintendent of city schools—Albert Hart—that he has no opponent. The selection for school directors for the several wards was of the very best and most competent citizens, who command the respect of the entire community. To them, like the superintendent, there can be no valid objections. Let the friends of the public schools, therefore, on Monday put an X at the top of the republican ticket and we can be assured of a competent board of directors and a faithful and economic administration of the pride of American institutions—our public schools.

There is liable to be some confusion at the respective polling places on Monday, in this: That there have been no precinct registers, or supplementary register, printed for the school election. So far as the same is applicable the old precinct lists will be used, but this, unless there is a thorough understanding among judges and officers of election, will lead to confusion. Electors who were residing in one precinct last election may now have a legal residence in another precinct. Thus the dilemma will appear of being registered in one precinct and actually residing in another, where his name does not appear on the precinct register. As a matter of law, the elector can only exercise his franchise at his legal residence. If he has resided in the precinct 30 days, and is duly registered on the great register, the fact that the county clerk and board of trustees have not printed new precinct registers, cannot deprive him of his right to vote. Therefore, when a qualified elector has gained a residence in another precinct from that in which he was registered a year and a half ago, it will be the duty of the officers of election to accept his vote at the precinct where he has secured that residence, provided he has been registered on the great register, although his name may not appear on the last printed precinct register for that precinct. For illustration: Suppose an elector resided at Folsom at the last state and county election, and three or four months ago acquired a residence in this city; his name would be on the great register, and the precinct register for Folsom, yet, having acquired a legal residence in this city, and there not having been any precinct registers printed for the school election to take place on Monday, this citizen could not be deprived of his vote by that failure.

Our contemporaries occasionally "slop over" on the question of alleged "fixing" or "squaring" of criminal cases in the police court. They do not seem to understand that when a case is dismissed in open court by the court on the motion of the prosecution, or on the motion of the judge himself, that it is perfectly lawful, and the exercise of a discretion that has always lodged in the court. It is unjust for newspapers to indulge in intimations that there is something wrong in such action. There are many criminal charges that have great mitigating circumstances which properly address themselves to the discretionary powers of the court and the mercy and humanity of the prosecution. There is a very great difference in the character of criminal charges although the law makes little distinction, but through wise provisions of the statutes there is a large discretion made to rest in the judge, particularly in misdemeanor cases. Where a person, of hitherto good character, has been tempted to commit some crime, say the larceny of some article of trifling value, and the prosecution of the case to a conviction would result in making a damaging record against him for life, and cause his utter ruin, then it is proper and right that the court should avert this ultimate result by the exercise of a sound and humane discretion.

Christianity and religion, when professed by honest, sincere and well-meaning people, are characteristics and attainments that are not only commendable and laudable in the human family, but without which the world would soon be a chaos. But when that christianity and religion are represented by your insincere, canting hypocrite, or sensational pulpit acrobat, or maudling sentimentalist, then, indeed, has religion fallen from its high estate and become a mockery and a snare to catch the unwary. We have in California some of just that latter kind of "christians," who, so far from being of benefit to their race, are a source of annoyance and an obstruction in the march of life.

We have constantly in our midst examples of those so-called missionaries who forever live in a lachrymose state for the unfortunate heathen who is compelled to live in far-away lands without the benign light of the Gospel. These remarks are suggested by reading in one of the San Francisco papers of last Monday the following: "Reverend Mr. Sunderland, secretary of the Foreign Mission society, nearly shed tears at this morning's weekly conference of Baptist ministers in Y. M. C. A. hall, when he spoke of the thousands of savages in distant lands who are dying without having been evangelized or receiving the spirit of God." Has this reverend humanitarian no lachrymal duct wherein is concealed an unshed tear for the poor thousands who daily beg bread, not bibles or tracts, in the streets of his own city? Has he no word of encouragement for the Magdalens of his home Barbary coast, without outfitting a fleet for that of African shores? Has he ever dwelt on the thought of the good that might be accomplished among the denizens of the "House of Blazes," "Hell's Delight," the "Rock House," "Battle Row," "Murderer's Corner"—representative headquarters of the very lowest of humanity in the city of his adoption? Or when on bended knee in his oratory, while he tearfully contemplated at what post of apostolic duty his God-like mission might be best subserved, has this crying evangelist once considered what a field of missionary labor is opened before him and his co-workers in the vineyard of the Lord and to be found in the lodging houses, "no questions asked," of Kearny, Montgomery, Market, Grant avenue and nearly every other street in his own dear, sanctified city? If he has not, we would commend to his sorrowing soul that trite yet most appropriate Biblical injunction, that "charity begins at home," where he will find evangelical work for the remainder of his years, were they of the duration of those of Mathusala many times multiplied.

While we are a strong believer in the instruction in the classics, and that the benefits far outweigh any labor and time spent in their pursuit, we cannot ignore the fact that the practical application thereof in the ordinary affairs of life is very small. Particularly is this true of the Greek. Very few men or women, in the after years, remember more than the alphabet, and would find it difficult to render a single passage in Xenophon or the Iliad. James Payn, the eminent English writer, in a somewhat humorous vein, gives his ideas of "Compulsory Greek": When the next struggle against "Compulsory Greek" comes on, I should like to see two witnesses put into the box, both of tender years, but whose testimony would be much more to the point than any mere academical arguments. What is most strongly dwelt upon by those who would release us from Greek bonds (not a very promising—or at least performing—phrase of itself, by-the-bye) is that the study is an unpractical one; but much more serious objections would be advanced by the witnesses in question. The elder would be a young man of twenty-five, the younger a boy of fourteen, both of the ordinary type. The latter (if he told the truth) would say: "I have suffered more from Greek than from any other study; it has been the cause of most of my school-troubles; it has deprived me of more holidays than all the rest together; I have never understood it, never! or, except from a crib, got the least notion of its meaning, and I have seen nothing to admire in it when I did. If it were not for Greek, and its particles and its aorists and its irregular verbs, and all the beastly things that belong to it, I could get along pretty well, though I know I am not clever. I hate the language more than I ever hated a master; but it's no use saying 'I wish it was dead!' because it's dead already." The young man (if he spoke truth) would say: "As the thing is over and done with, thank heaven! so far as I am concerned, I don't want to make a fuss about it; but when I had to learn it, I must confess Greek seemed to me a most infernal language. You gentlemen inform me that it is full of beauties, but I never got so far in it as to perceive them. I still recognize the Greek letters when I see them, but everything but the alphabet has entirely left my mind; and yet I must have spent whole years in the fruitless attempt to acquire it. I am told, nevertheless, that that attempt has 'improved my logical faculties and formed my literary taste.' Of this I have only to observe that a man who believes that will believe anything." As these two witnesses represent nineteen-twentieths of those who in youth are compelled to study Greek, their testimony strikes me as of some value.

[Written for THEMIS.]

Professional men seem to have accustomed themselves to sacrifice their conscientious scruples, their individual regard to what is true and just and good, to obtain success in their respective callings. They have all been required to go contrary to their judgments and consciences in order to obtain their respective places. They have been obliged to make false vows or professions; they have been obliged to conform to laws which they believe to be vicious, or to go in some other respect contrary to their feelings and convictions. We know that men frequently try to keep their private conscience distinct from their professional conscience, but they cannot always succeed. When people accustom themselves to what is wrong, in the way of business or in the routine of their professions, it would be foolish to expect them always to do what is right in their private transactions. People who accustom themselves to violate the truth in their professions will hardly be truthful in their private and social intercourse. Men cannot do wrong in any case without injuring, to some extent, their moral feelings, their dispositions, their characters. As the dyer's hand assumes the color of what it works in, so do the natures of professional men take on the character of the profession by which they live. You know the lawyer, the doctor, or the professional clergyman, when you see them, by their unnatural manners. They are not simply men, but particular sorts of men; and, unfortunately, they are not as they often seem to think themselves, or as they appear to wish others to think them, more than men, but something less than men—men who have sacrificed their own selves to become the paid instruments of a vicious and unnatural system. True, there are some exceptions—some men who, although they conformed to the unreasonable and unnatural requirements of their professions during the early period of their professional life, do at length assert their dignity as human beings, emancipate themselves from the trammels of their professions, set at nought the evil principles of their respective callings, and begin to act like rational and moral creatures—men who, after having been for a time slaves of a sect, a system, or a profession, emancipate themselves and begin to regulate their conduct by a regard to their own sense of right, and their own views of truth. But men of this description are exceedingly rare. We seldom meet with them. It is only men of superior powers—men of unusually vigorous intellects—men of genius, spiritual giants, that can thus rise above the errors and vices of their profession and free themselves from the horrible and unnatural thralldom to which their parents or their friends consigned them. And even those few who, by the exercise of their superior powers, have succeeded in the world, would have succeeded still better—would have succeeded still more—if they had never belonged to a profession; if they had begun at first, as they are obliged to begin afterwards, to act on their own individual judgments. And see how the men who thus disenthral themselves are persecuted and hated by men whose professions and unnatural conventionalities they have dared to set at nought. It is now that the common herd of professional men reveal the most odious and pitiful traits of their professional characters. With but little minds themselves, they dare to censure and condemn the greatest minds of the age. With spirits that dare not question the greatest errors, the most palpable inconsistencies, the most unnatural customs, the most ridiculous authorities, they venture to wage war with the very spirits of heaven—with the bravest and divinest of all God's creatures. They fabricate and circulate the grossest falsehoods. They fabricate and circulate them wholesale. They give their united testimony to known and notorious calumnies. They will join even to prosecute at law superior virtue and superior skill, charge the very saviors of men's bodies with murder or manslaughter, and the saviors of men's souls with leading people to damnation.

No faith can be placed in professional men. In vain shall we look to them for truth and justice; in vain shall we look to them for the beauties, the excellencies, the virtues, which adorn and glorify humanity. It is a strange thing that so many should sacrifice themselves, should throw themselves away, for such slight and doubtful advantages. It is a strange thing that the temptation to men to throw themselves away should be so fearfully strong. It is a strange thing that so few, so very few, should preserve their self-respect; that so few should choose to please themselves rather than to please others; that so many choose to undo themselves, to war with themselves, to war with their better selves, through life for the sake of obtaining the doubtful honors and advantages connected with trades or professions. We know of nothing that afflicts us more than the thought that there are so few true men in the world; so few who act in accordance with their own thoughts and their own feelings, their own convictions and their own consciences. We know no more melancholy thought than the thought that even the men who stand at the head of affairs, the men who take the lead in society, who rule the hearts and sway the destinies of the multitudes—the rulers, the doctors, the lawyers, the priests, the soldiers, the policemen, the magistracy and the leading tradesmen, with multitudes of others, should all accommodate themselves to systems which they more or less disapprove, which their judgments and their hearts condemn; that they should all act upon the principle of expediency, the principle of compromise, the principle of sacrificing their truest thoughts and their divinest feelings to convenience, the wish or will of others, to a gainful, easy, social life. We know nothing more melancholy than the thought that the true, good man, the man who will not lie, the man who will not sin, the man who will not bow down to the world's will against his own convictions and feelings, the man who is determined to be a man, to be himself, to think and speak and act with freedom, with courage, with respect to God, to truth and to duty only; we say we know nothing more melancholy than the thought that such men as these, who are in truth the most excellent, the most lovely, the most deserving, the most venerable, the most truly human and the most truly divine—we know nothing more melancholy than the thought that men of this description, whose only fault, if we may call it a fault, is that they are too pure, too good, too holy, for this world, should, instead of meeting with respect and love and reverence; instead of being honored for their truthfulness and virtue; instead of being rewarded with the thanks and praises of mankind as the best benefactors of their race, meet with coldness or hate, shy looks or frowns, contempt or reproach, persecution and insult. Yet so it is. The best of men meet with the cruellest of treatment; the worst of men, the men who in truth unman themselves to false and unnatural systems, meet with rewards and favors, with smiles and plaudits.

CONTENT IN A LIGHTHOUSE TOWER.

A Little Island Where a Handful of People Work and are Happy.

The life of a lighthouse keeper is not thrilled with novelty at the best of times, but when winter comes on, with its storms of sleet, wind and driving snow, a black gloom settles over his white tower which not even his bright beacon light can pierce. Then the days are short, and the night watches are long, and filled with the tumult of the roaring sea and the loud-voiced wind. The sun's rays have no sooner warmed than they are folded in the shroud of twilight, and when daylight breaks, the pale beams of the morning fall on churning, black waves beating against snow and ice encrusted rocks, and there is a slate-color of cheerless atmosphere over the sea. But the keeper's life is not all dead monotony and lifeless toleration.

Straight out of the sea that washes the coast of Maine, off the mouth of the Kennebec river, rises a small island which is a mass of rock, tree fringed, but black-looking. From its top for over a century has gleamed a light for coasting vessels and ships making for the Kennebec river. The tower where the bright eye shines from twilight till sunrise is 200 feet above the face of the ocean when it is calm, and its streaming path of yellow beams is seen for miles by those who sail under the stars while the rest of the world sleeps. There is no more rugged, dangerous coast along the seaboard of Maine than here, and when a southeast gale rages, the waves pound on the cliffs and reefs with a roar that goes rumbling up the quiet Kennebec or breaks faintly among the pine forests inland.

In summer the sea is dazzling in its glassy smoothness until it rolls in where a broad beach stretches below Fort Popham, and curving, breaks in a shower of foam, flashing with salt drops under the hot sun rays. Then the coast is picturesquely beautiful and quiet. Summer cottages showing on the slopes and heights, or nearer down where the beach runs away to shelve through the foam-frosted breakers into the sparkling blue, are pleasingly peaceful, and the veranda and shade look attractive to those who are skirting along without on the heat-reflecting water. You can see on the paths trailing over the cliff, among trees and fern-grown rocks, or the ample foliage of shrubs or bushes, the gay colors of women's summer gowns. At the base of the cliff, on dripping, black-faced rocks, more of them are walking, where the water comes up to their feet. There is not a great deal of life; just enough to show the stranger that there are people who enjoy life of this sort and are content to get away from the busy rush of cities or the feverish heat of fashion's favorite summer places.

But when fall is turning into bleak winter it is all very different. Storms tear up the shining beach and strip the cliff of its foliage. They send the ocean, straight up like a gray wall, thundering against the grim heights. They batter down projecting rocks and send avalanches of white-whirling foam and deep-colored water with a sweeping rush over the black-topped reefs and the rock-points. The fair-weather visitors have fled weeks before from the unforbidding place, but just as in the summer, when the ocean was placid and the shore was brilliant in color, the bright light over on Seguin's stern rock shines steadily every night, only through a blacker night and across high swelling water.

"I don't find it so lonely here in winter as you might think," said the keeper to the writer one summer. "You see I have my wife and family here and the two assistant keepers and one of them is married. We make a good working community and get along very nicely together. You see how comfortable I am. We have a pleasant home. It isn't a palace, but there is one thing about it—its foundations are solid. It won't blow away if a little breeze should spring up, and we do have breezes once in awhile," he added with a quiet smile.

"Of course it is pretty hard to get to shore in winter. The winds are terrific and the seas run high, and when a heavy storm sets in, getting across is out of the question. But in these times we are kept pretty busy. You see it's a big job to keep the light clean. There's all that glass and then there are the lights themselves. We have to watch them carefully. It wouldn't do to have anything happen to the light," he said, seriously. "Vessels would go astray for miles around and no one knows what would happen."

"Yes, that's a good light, one of the best in the country, and it's known to every sailor who was ever in these waters. I suppose tens of thousands of ships have marked their course by it. If anything happens to the lamps I can put in new ones in no time. No, that glass isn't easily broken. There is none better in the world, and it costs a lot of money. We are polishing it all the time. We keep these silk curtains over it in the day time."

"When we have a storm with fog and sleet, there is more to do than to look after the light. We get up steam and the old fog-horn howls all night and all day. It makes an awful noise, but we like it. We have two boilers to make steam and two horns, in case of accident."

"Lighthouses are expensive. Lots of oil and miles of wick are used, but they save millions of dollars every year. Then it gets chilly up here," he added, with a twinkle in his eye. "It takes a good deal of coal to keep warm. If you are in need of exercise when the weather is unusually nasty, you can get it climbing these stairs up into the tower when you are attending to the light. It's a nice little jog up and down, and you can take it as often as you like. Some nights up here, when a gale is howling, something happens which makes your heart come up in your throat, no matter how used you are to it. You will hear a sudden thud on the glass, where the gale has swept a gull or a shore bird through the air until, seeing the light, it struggles to turn its course, and is thrown up against the glass. Yes, it kills them. Sometimes they flutter weakly against it and then slip down and are killed in the fall. It makes one sorry for them, but you can't save them; they are on the outside and you are in."

"We live very well here. I have a good little farm up on this rock. You see it's hardly more than a rock; but we have the surface of it under cultivation. There's our garden, and we raise corn, good potatoes and vegetables. It gives us pleasant work in the summer and a good store of luxuries to draw on in winter."

"Accidents? Well, last winter I slipped on the ice and went off that cliff there. It was a long fall, and the only thing that saved me was that I landed among the ice and snow covered branches of the trees, over 100 feet below. They stuck holes into me until I was a sieve; and when they found me I had a half a dozen ribs broken; but, you see, I'm all right now."

"No, I wouldn't give up this life for any other that I know of. I was raised in Seguin, and my children will be raised here. We have everything that we want and are perfectly contented. It's as big an affair for us to sail over to Popham as for some people to go to Europe. That's what makes the difference, I suppose. We are used to this life, and we like it."

So here is a community finding work enough to do to keep from the discontent of idleness, and making for itself amusement and comfort enough to inspire that much-sought pleasure, content; and all on a little rock island in the ocean, where in winter nature is so brutally proud and masterfully arrogant that within the memory of those who live on that coast to-day a great clipper ship coming there, after sailing the seas of the world, was caught up in a black sou'easter, whirled out of her course and dashed to fragments on the roaring coast, every man on board being swallowed from the earth in the boiling ocean.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Few actors can do "Shylock," because it is always so difficult to do a Jew.

Miss Lotta Crabtree denies the tender impeachment that she is going to be married to Douglas Shireley, of Louisville.

People will cry at a theater who are less moved at, or entirely indifferent to, the real sorrows of their next-door neighbor.

"Thespian mansions" are to be built in Liverpool, Dublin and Glasgow, for the purpose of providing better lodgings for touring actors than are available at present.

Dick Golden has been entirely cured by the bi-chloride of gold process, and says he will never touch whisky again. Since his recovery he is drawing crowded houses in Jed Prouty.

That jolly fun-maker, Bobby Gaylor, is said to have found his happiest creation in the part of "Sport McAllister," the leader of the "400." It gives him plenty of scope for his inimitable songs and funny sayings.

Mme. Albani-Gye is described by one of her admirers as amiable, unaffected, sincere and jolly. She is very charming as well as very bright, is absolutely devoid of vanity, and is one of the few stage women who have made happy marriages.

The noted French singer Paulus, who is at the head of European variety-vocalists, receives the largest salary paid to any such singer or comedian in years. Paulus is described as an extraordinary mimic, who acts his songs through realistic gestures. He possesses an excellent baritone voice.

Ginia Ravagli, who has made so pronounced a hit as "Orpheus" in Gluck's opera with the Abbey company, is a lovely woman with a spirituelle face. She and her sister Sofia are inseparable, and are great pets in musical circles in London. They are excellent pianists and accomplished players on the mandolin.

The first theatrical company that came from England to the United States landed at York, Va., and made its first public appearance at Williamsburg, Va., September 5, 1872. This is said to be the first company of any kind to present dramas on American boards. Sterne's Conscious Lovers and the Fair Penitent were the plays produced.

A fraud that would not be possible in the minor cities of America has been perpetrated upon French country people. The famous Coquelin, the elder, has a physical counterpart in the person of a provincial double, who has been going about one of the interior districts proclaiming himself to be the renowned actor of the Comédie Française. Thanks to his resemblance to the great player, the country fraud drew full audiences in the theaters of the district, whose benighted playgoers for a long time believed they had the real thing and not a vulgar impostor. The charlatan even became bold enough to represent himself for awhile as the elder Coquelin in Madrid, but he was identified, exposed and arrested.

When Miss Leiter, the Chicago beauty, was in Venice recently she was shown the palace within which the famous pillow scene is said to have been enacted, and was shown the room in which Desdemona slept on that fatal night when Othello took her life. There is a story that at night, when the fatal hour comes, strange things appear to occupants of the room; so no one is allowed to occupy it. It is told that the Moor, with jealousy, love and anger on his swarthy face, hangs over the couch and repeats the evil deed for which his soul still must wander and know no rest. Miss Leiter desired to sleep in that room. American gold overcame the objections of the owner, and the American belle spent the night in the room with no vision of the fair Desdemona to disturb her slumbers.

Marie Jansen, the actress, emphatically denies that she drank or frolicked with Harvard students, as stated on the authority of a Kentucky undergraduate in the Louisville Courier-Journal. Miss Jansen says: "Indeed, I only know Cambridge as a place through which I have driven several times, and all I know of Harvard students is not worth mentioning, though such of them as I have met are of a very different type from the ones he represents. If the Louisville paper has for an editor one of those local creations, a chivalrous son of Kentucky, ever ready to rush to the aid of womankind, I hope he will say to that young curled darling's papa that what the youth needs most can best be administered by the paternal side of the house, and while Harvard can teach him a curriculum well enough in its way, there is a fundamental matter that needs correction through the medium of a heavy hand and a well-soled slipper. A strict regard for truth can best be inculcated at the mother's knee or over the father's."

Book Chat.

The average country newspaper comes out in a new dress about as seldom as the editor's wife.

We are soon to have a flood of syndicate or serial novels and romances from five or six second and third rate English story tellers.

Edwin Arnold, it is said, smokes when he writes editorials. He differs in this from some editors who make other people "smoke."

There are eighty-seven daily papers in Paris, against twenty-five in London. The Parisian sheets are usually very small, and most of them are subsidized.

It has been generally supposed that the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls, the husband of Charlotte Bronte, was dead, but he is still living in an obscure parish of Ireland, where he occasionally preaches.

The idea of Miss Amelia B. Edwards that the secret of success in the writing of fiction is to be summed up in the single word "sincerity," may be correct from her point of view, but in the fiction of politics sincerity gets mauled around in an iconoclastic cyclone.

A good book, whether a novel or not, is one that leaves you farther on than when you took it up. If, when you read it, it drops you down in the same old spot, with no finer outlook, no clearer vision, no stimulated desire for that which is better and higher, it is in no sense a good book.

The most popular Turkish poetess is a Russian lady. Her name is Olga Lovedoba, but she is known by her pseudonym, "Hulaere," to the Turks, who delight to recite poems. Besides her original productions she makes translations from the Russian poets into the modern Arabic.

And now comes Walter Besant, as the lawyers say, to champion the cause of the people who declare that dancing is not sinful. "It is the most innocent of all amusements," says Mr. Besant, "and to the young the most delightful." Many people who stigmatize dancing as immoral lose sight of the fact that it had its origin in the religious festivals of the ancients.

Another Kipling has written a book. It is Rudyard's sister this time, who has taken advantage of the success of "one of the family" in his literary ventures, to secure a publisher for a very commonplace volume. It is entitled "The Heart of a Maid," and the scene is laid in India. However, it has no local coloring whatever, and the whole story is tame and insipid.

"I suppose no man who handles a pen is paid such large prices for his work as Mr. Gladstone," says Edward W. Bok, in the Philadelphia Times. "For an article of average length he receives $1,000 and has been paid $2,000 for one piece of work of 5,000 words. Not long ago he penned an article for a friend of mine. It was barely 1,000 words in length, and yet he was paid $500 for it. Fifty cents a word, and how quickly a word is written! A man could be a Cæsar in no time at that rate. But, then, there is only one Gladstone."

The books of to-day will fall to pieces before the middle of the next century, say the experts. The paper in the books that have survived two or three centuries was made by hand of honest rags and without the use of strong chemicals, while the ink was made of nut galls. To-day much of the paper for books is made, at least in part, of wood pulp treated with powerful acids, while the ink is a compound of various substances naturally at war with the flimsy paper upon which it is laid. The printing of two centuries ago has improved with age; that of to-day, it is feared, will within fifty years eat its way through the paper.

The following is after the style of Amelie Rives, and is from the Bradford Era:

"In the swatling swirl of the soughful wind, as the gust goes glooming by, I sit by the bole of the baneful borch, with a moan and a soulful sigh. The mellowing mists of the eve are low, and the frog in the dankful marsh chirps chirpingly sad in the ghoulsome gloom, in a swivering voice and harsh:

"Oh, where is the swing of the swoonful swish,
And the voice of the flim flam fowl?
Methinks it maans from a murky mould
And the home of the hootful owl."

"Now, swivel me swift from the surging spring. I'm weary of wold and wind; the grewsome graik of the jobberwock comes jimmering to my mind. The feeble song of the sportsome frog comes solemnwise, soughing slow, and again I hear by the bournful birch the wail of his wimpled woe:

"Oh, where is the swing of the swoonful swish,
From the land of the springful sprole?
Must the blue mists blur on the drinkful drale,
And freight with their frought my soul?"

"I dreamed I dreamed of Amelie Rives, in the dim of the danksome dark, and methought I rode on a moonful main in the prow of a pullful barque. I wrought a rhyme as I roamed along, in the stream of the starful grote; I woke at dawn in the dimful day, and above is the rhyme I wrote."

Professional Chat.

Suit-able reward—Lawyers' fees.

Law is like physic, they that take least of it are best off.

Sometimes the schoolmaster learns more than all his books have taught him from the simple-minded, seventeen-year old girl who sets in one of the back seats and looks at him shyly without speaking when he asks the dates of the Punic wars.

Is it fair that a court of law should be called upon to determine the question of the sanity of a deceased gentleman who insisted during his lifetime that all lawyers were rascals? Could the learned court decide a matter of that kind without bias?

Several gentlemen were sipping wine and enjoying a good dinner at a city hotel, when the conversation turned to the subject of good feeders. "I don't think it is true," remarked one of the men, "that a large man eats more than a small one. I understand Grover Cleveland, who is sensitive about his fat, doesn't devour as much food daily as a thin, lank man like Senator Evarts."

Justice Daniels, who lately retired from the Supreme court of New York, began life as a cobbler. He is about 70 years old, and has been somewhat eccentric in the matter of dress. He always appeared in low shoes and white socks, and never wore an overcoat. During his term he has sat on the bench with Justices Noah Davis, George C. Barrett, George L. Ingraham and George P. Andrews.

To a layman up a tree it looks as if that rantankerous heretic, Dr. Charles A. Briggs, were running matters and things pretty much his own way in the New York presbytery. The latest heresy put through by this alarming innovator is a resolution abolishing the ancient doctrine of infant damnation. Briggs seems to differ from his brother preachers not so much in faith as in the particular of moral valor. He speaks what he thinks, and the others hasten to his reinforcement as soon as he starts the ball to rolling.

John Randolph, of Virginia, once had occasion to spend the night at a country inn. The landlord tried several times to ascertain the destination of his distinguished guest, without success. Mr. Randolph turned upon him, and, in a very decided tone, said: "Landlord, do I owe you anything?" "Nothing, sir," was the reply. "Well, then, I am going where I please." The road forked not far from the tavern, and it so happened that Mr. Randolph was at a loss which road to take, and sent a servant back to inquire which of these roads led to the village of —. The landlord, standing in front of the tavern, cried at the top of his voice, "Mr. Randolph, you don't owe me a cent! Take just which road you please."

About fifteen years ago "Clint" White was one of the boys, and never lost an opportunity for a "little time," or a "night off." Of late years "Clint" has been a "reformer," and his reform notions are so ultra in some particulars that many are inclined to denominate them bordering on crankism. But a few evenings ago, in company with a party of gentlemen, we recounted the following reminiscence of Clint White, during the days wherein he was engaged in sowing wild oats. On the night before the glorious 4th of July, something like 16 years ago, Clint White and a number of jovial companions were preparing for a burlesque celebration, and, of course, the crowd were out late, frequently stimulating for the occasion. The sinews of war were the proceeds of an appropriation made by the general committee on celebration, and White was chairman of the burlesque committee, while another member of the party was treasurer. When funds ran low the chairman would draw an order on the treasurer, who was always present, thereby insuring funds for "another round" for the boys. Well, this was kept up until the crowd became pretty well primed up, and as the early morning hours approached most of the saloons had closed. In the absence of other means of excitement, it was proposed to run a footrace down J street, from Fourth to Second. The proposition was at once acted upon. The night was a beautiful moonlight. The party, consisting of a dozen or more, steadied themselves into line, and one of the number gave the word to "go." Clint White was considerable of an athlete, and could easily outrun the rest of the party, and led the race until he came about the middle of the block between Second and Third, when he observed what he thought was an obstruction across the sidewalk, he stopped and tried to duck under it, while engaged in this the rest of the party passed him. The fact was that the moonlight cast the shadow of an awning-post across the sidewalk, and Clint White thought somebody had put an obstruction there. It was a long time before the boys let up on him for mistaking the shadow of an awning-post for an obstruction. He declared, however, that he would have won the race had it not been for the supposed obstruction. Of late years Clinton L. White is much more devoted to the substance than the shadow.

NOTES.

"Does a man forget his first wife?" is the question a brilliant woman is now discussing in print. Which, the same, reminds us of the fellow who said his wife was "the sunshine of his existence" because she made it so hot for him.

Women have not monopolized quite all the vanity that escaped with the other ilk from Pandora's casket. A gilt-edged darling in New York keeps a private tailor, to whom he pays a large salary to cut out suits of clothes from the dandy's own designs, which he studies out and produces in water colors.

A parent who sends his child to a school at which the rules provide that all letters sent to a pupil are to be first opened and read by the school authorities, has no redress by the postal statutes for an opened letter. When he sends his child to the school he agrees to its rules and authorizes the principal to open the child's mail.

Some mathematician of leisure has been estimating the number of islands in the world, and has succeeded in counting some hundreds of thousands. He says there are over 1,000 islands under the flag of Japan. Strangely enough he makes no reference to the Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence, or to the thousands in our own Georgian bay, some of which are of considerable size.

A Georgia editor created a sensation in church while they were singing a well-known hymn by bawling out in a spirit of absent-mindedness:

Let every kindred, every tribe,
On this terrestrial ball
Put down their dollar and subscribe,
And we'll receipt for all!

He was promptly expelled, without even a chance to take up a collection.

Father McGlynn, the priest who was ejected from St. Patrick's church, in New York, because he would not go to Rome to answer charges of preaching false doctrine preferred by Archbishop Corrigan, says it is wrong to call him an unfrocked priest, because he still has his frock and no power can take it from him. It is also wrong to call him an ex-priest, as according to strict theology he will be a priest for all eternity, in heaven or in hell. He is simply a priest out of a job.

That was a deserved compliment when Superintendent of State Printing A. J. Johnston appointed J. O. Funston foreman of the bindery department. Mr. Funston, by reason of his skill and experience in book binding, is the right man in the right place.

The wrecking of the fortune and the life of that eminent man, Cyrus W. Field, by the reckless acts of his son, is deplorable. No man stood higher in the estimation of the American people than Cyrus W. Field. This event is a shock alike to the people as well as the eminent family of Fields.

At a great dinner by the shipping exchange in London, Thursday, there seemed to be a very warm feeling expressed for the United States by our English cousins. The leading toast on that occasion was: "We must love our dear cousins across the water, and should stand shoulder to shoulder and whip creation." This does not look much like an unfriendly sentiment from our mother country.

A "Consolidated Black Cat Company" has been incorporated at Fair Haven, Washington. One of the Puget-sound islands is to be devoted exclusively to the development and multiplication of black cats. The projectors expect to make millions out of the fur of the sable felines, and this mercenary view of the case seems to be the only redeeming feature of the project. We have learned, to our cost, some salutary lessons regarding rabbits and English sparrows, and those Washington speculators should go slow on black cats.

A sandbag is one of the most useful of household articles. Its virtues are equal if not superior to the hot-water bag, and the cost is considerably less. The sand should be fine and clean and should be thoroughly dried out before being "bagged." It is better to cover the flannel bag which holds the sand with a cotton one, as this prevents the sand from sifting out. A bag not larger than ten inches square is an available size. Mothers whose children are subject to earache will find these bags invaluable. They hold the heat a long time, and their composition is such that they are easily adjustable to the affected parts.

"They that plow iniquity and sow wickedness reap the same. There is a common expression that is very often used, but not applied properly. When a young man is a little bit wild and inclined to run around and drink, it is remarked that he is only sowing his wild oats; he will be all right after awhile. Just there is where the mistake is made. The wild oats sown in youth will spring up when least expected. There is a certain species of grain called wild oats that never loses its vitality; it will lay on the ground for years, through heat and cold, rain or shine, but when in the course of events it is turned over by the plow, it will take root and grow and spread so fast as to choke the good grain. Just so with the young man in sowing the so-called wild oats. A few of the seeds may fall and lay dormant for years, and when least expected take root and grow. Then is when he reaps the fruits of his early indiscretion, and he begins to understand the expression 'Sowing his wild oats.' Be warned in time, for who can tell, if you sow ever so little, it will increase fourfold in the end?"

Literary Work and Writers.

There are to-day more chances than ever for special literary work. There are more papers and periodicals than ever devoted to special trades, occupations, arts and pursuits. The store, the farm, the garden, the mine, the worker in wood or metal or cloth, the electrician, the sailor, the railroad, and a hundred other interests are all now represented by publications. All these make places for editors. There are people who have great talent for putting words and sentences together, yet who know relatively little. There are others who know a great deal, but can neither put their knowledge on paper nor talk it out to others. Can there not be an exchange of talent managed somehow between these two classes? If any man or woman has really anything to tell, they can learn to tell it properly on paper. If they keep on learning, as they become fuller and fuller of knowledge they must talk it. There is a great deal of nonsense lying around loose to the effect that the writing talent is an especial gift of the "pen," and that it is impossible for those who cannot write with ease to do so. This is not to be believed. No man or woman knows what power is latent in them until they set to work to dig it out.—The Inland Printer for December.

She sat on his lap, and, quite bursting with pride, He asked: "Ain't this lovely?" and thus she replied:

"Why, my boy, I've seen chairs that were better by half, But, still, I admire those upholstered in calf."

Boarding Houses and Boarders.

A woman, driven by the vicissitudes of life to throw her home open to boarders, finds the experience, as most other women who try it do, difficult, to say the least. But she says, philosophically: "I am learning human nature. I have discovered that the soft-voiced, refined-looking woman often carries tigerish claws beneath her velvet, and that the frank-looking, well-dressed man may develop into a 'Meddlesome Matty' before my eyes. I don't know why humanity should become brutal when it essays boarding, but it seems to. A woman called recently, liked my apartments, and returned to the parlor to 'talk business,' as she said, with an engaging smile.

"Business" meant a series of searching, relentless questions and exactions which set my cheeks aflame and filled my eyes with hot tears of mortification. Did I intend purchasing a new carpet for the parlor? Were my stairs and halls usually kept somewhat cleaner than they appeared that day? Were my beds clean? Did I have two kinds of meat for dinner? Use home-made bread entirely? and, finally, 'Did a maid open the front door as a rule? This was a gratuitous impertinence. I was taking the letters from the postman as she came up the steps, and naturally received her. And then she went away, after taking three names as references. I insisted in turn that she should give me one, that of a former landlady, and it was one of the small compensations of my lot, when she wrote me a week later that she found my references satisfactory and would take the rooms, to reply that I had found her reference most unsatisfactory, and was sure I could not tolerate her exactions.

"A man came to me the other night, and, after forcing my price down as low as he could, asked me if my husband was a Christian? If my family attended church and Sunday-school? If my other boarders were God-fearing people; and if Sunday was observed with religious quiet by everybody in the house?

"People ask me to take them cheaply because they are saving to buy a home, or because the husband has extra office expenses, or, as one gushing creature told me, 'because we want to go to Europe next summer.' The more they want the less they want to pay. Look at the advertisements for 'board wanted,' 'everything unexceptionable,' and 'terms moderate.' Would these people think of going into a shop and saying, 'I want your most expensive goods at a low price? Yet they do precisely that with me. Surroundings, appointments and service that mean a serious outlay they demand and are not willing to pay for. They cannot afford to keep up an establishment to their liking, and they ask me to do it for them without adequate compensation. The average man or woman seems to part with his courtesy, sense of justice, and humanity when he starts out to become a boarder."—N. Y. Times.

Scolds, Male and Female.

It was the old tradition that only women were scolds. "Madam," said Dr. Johnson, "we have different modes of restraining evil: stocks for the men, a ducking-stool for the women and a pond for beasts." And a ducking-stool was for the purpose of cooling the temper of shrews.

I'll speed me to the pond where the high stool
On the long plank hangs o'er the muddy pool;
That stool, the dread of every scolding queen.

Then there was the bridle for the scold;
Still for women.

Chester presents Walton with a bridle
To curb women's tongues that talk so idle.

But man has in these later years been discovered to be possessed of vanity and other erstwhile feminine vices; and while statistically inclined persons have discovered that more men than women look at themselves in the mirrors of ferry boats, we have also more than one recent and well-authenticated example of the male scold.

What a Kiss Has Done.

Was not Voltaire publicly killed in the stage box by the beautiful Duchess de Villars, in compliance with the demands of an enthusiastic pit, to thus reward the author of Merope? The kiss has been the bribe of politics; for when Fox was contesting the hard-won seat at Westminster the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire offered to kiss all who would vote for the great statesman.

And the inspiration of patriotism is the kiss; for did not the fair Lady Gordon turn recruiting sergeant when the ranks of the Scottish regiments had been depleted by Salamanca, and tempted the gallant lads by placing the recruiting shilling between her lips for all who would take it with their own?

One of the wars of the roses, the fiercest and deadliest of them all, was fought on a field where, curiously enough, a rose peculiar to the spot grows, or used to grow, says the London News. It is a rare plant now, there. They are said to have been plentiful at the commencement of this century, but the visitors have taken them away in such numbers that they have become rare. The little roses are white, with a red spot in the center of each of their petals, and as they grow old the under surface becomes a dull-red color.

The Hen and the Parrot.

Our next-door neighbor owns an amusing parrot, which is always getting into mischief, but usually gets out without much trouble to herself. When she has done anything for which she knows she ought to be punished she holds her head to one side, and, eyeing her mistress, says, in a sing-song tone, "Polly is a good girl," until she sees her mistress smile; then she flaps her wings and cries out, "Hurrah! Polly is a good girl." She has been allowed to go free in the garden, where she promenades back and forth sunning herself and warning off all intruders.

One morning a hen strayed out of the chicken yard, and was quietly picking up her breakfast, when Poll marched up to her and called out "Shoo!" in her shrill voice. The poor hen retreated to her own quarters, running as fast as she could, followed by Poll, who screamed "Shoo!" at every step.

A few days later Poll extended her morning walk into the chicken yard. Here, with her usual curiosity, she went peering into every corner, till she came to the old hen on her nest. The hen made a dive for Poll's yellow head, but missed it. Poll, thinking discretion the better part of valor, turned to run; the hen, with wings wide-spread, followed close after.

As she ran, Poll screamed in her shrillest tones, "O Lord! O Lord!"

A member of the family, who had witnessed the performance, thought it time to interfere in Poll's behalf, as the angry hen was gaining on her. He ran out, and, stooping down, held out his hand. Poll lost no time in traveling up to his shoulder. Then, from her high vantage ground, she turned and, looking down on her foe, screamed, "Hello, there! Shoo!"

The frightened hen returned to her nest as rapidly as she had come.—Ashland Item.

Dishonesty.

If the adage be true, that the people have the government they deserve, we, as a sovereign people, have little to congratulate ourselves upon, as our sovereignty is in name only; but we rely upon—the professional politicians.

Perhaps we do not deserve a better government, since we are not over scrupulous, not to say dishonest. There is the dishonesty of conventionalism in which two persons spend their energies in deceiving each other premeditatedly. There is the dishonesty of the merchant who by strained effort induces his customers to purchase what they do not care for, and then offers his merchandise as of a different character to what they had supposed. Butterine, pepperine, adulterated liquids, inferior graded goods, spurious merchandise, alleged fire and bankrupt sales, mythical imported goods—all bear on their surface deceit. This same dishonesty is carried on in the walks of life. Love is feigned where the mercenary is an inducement. Men of learned professions are erudite as dissemblers; philanthropists, so-called, in reality gratify their desire for notoriety; agitators and professional foreigners engage in expressions of patriotism for revenue only; clergymen mistake their vocation by converting their pulpits into political rostrums; newspapers, ostensibly the expression, but in reality the repression, of public sentiment, are published to gratify the whim and fill the pockets of their proprietors. Deceit, from the cradle to the grave, seems the order of the day.—Chicago Press.

Settling a Duel.

An amusing story used to be told of a man who accepted a challenge to fight a duel. On the appointed day he sent word to his opponent to chalk on a board an outline of his (the challenged party's) figure, and if the challenger hit it he would consider himself wounded or dead, as the case might be.

This story may possibly have originated from one told of a certain irascible inn-keeper named Bardwell.

He was often at variance with his neighbors, and once he and a guest having quarreled agreed to fight a duel. At the appointed hour the adversary appeared armed with a gun. Bardwell loved a joke, and being very busy said to him:

"Tom, I'll tell you what I'll do; you go up and set up a board about my size, and shoot at it, and if you hit it I'll acknowledge myself killed, and invite the whole crowd to dinner."

The ludicrous proposition made everyone laugh and thus ended a farce.

The Story of the Black Tulip.

A story is told of a tulip fancier, in the time when the tulip fever raged in Holland, who, seceded, after years of cultivation, what had, up to that time, been deemed unobtainable, namely, a black tulip. He got only a single bulb, but it was worth thousands of dollars. Laying it on his table he left the room for a few moments, and coming back he found a friend waiting for him. The tulip bulb was gone.

"Where is my black tulip bulb?" he inquired anxiously.

"Do you mean that thing I found on your table a moment ago?" replied his friend. "I thought it was some sort of an apple, and I ate it."

There has never been a black tulip since.

FLASHES.

Fashion might be tolerated if it was set by the wise.

Fashionable society is frequently "horsey" and "doggy."

We sometimes think that love makes a fellow a "blooming idiot."

Matches may be made in heaven, but they often end in the other place.

It is easy to criticise those who have no use for your acquaintance.

Colonel Watterson says the next house of congress is "dangerously democratic."

There are too many very small potatoes, rotten as well, trying to be leading politicians—bosses.

The reputation you have been a lifetime in earning you can throw away in a moment unless it happens to be a bad reputation.

A man's conscience is like a restless baby; he no sooner gets it to sleep than something happens to wake it up again.

The best and most precious of gifts are without price, and come to mortals sometimes unsought, because before unknown.

There should be a law to discipline women who are afflicted with mischievous tongues. Private defamation is often worse than public.

People may become intelligent if they will, but they must take time to feed their minds. Information does not come unsought.

The Reaper, Death.

There is no death! an angel's form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread,
He bears our best loved things away.
And then we call them "dead."

The grim old ferryman has moved his muffled oar often within the past few weeks. No power can stay him on his silent course or melt his iron heart to pity. M. S. Cushman, one of the early citizens of this city, after a long and useful life, passed away Saturday night.

Edwin L. Hesser, a popular young man, just upon the threshold of life, yielded to the reaper's sickle.

Mrs. Dora Wining, an estimable lady, the mother of W. H. Wining, has been summoned to the dark unknown.

Mrs. Grace Hunt, widow of Hiram Hunt, was called to her rest last week. She was the daughter of L. C. Jordan, and had only been married two years when her husband died.

J. Fred Parsons, a popular young man, was stricken down by the unrelenting hand of death on Tuesday last. No man had a brighter future, and it seems that Fate has been cruel in this case.

Valuable Compilation.

State Librarian W. D. Perkins continues in the work of systematizing documents in the state library. He has just completed and published an index to bills introduced in the legislature of California during the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth sessions—from 1887 to 1891. There is a constant demand for information concerning legislation, so that this compilation became an absolute necessity. This volume contains over 300 pages and includes the titles of all bills, arranged under the name of the introducer, with references to their history and where they appear in the statutes. The bills are also arranged by subjects. It becomes an easy matter to obtain the desired information concerning any bill introduced, by consulting this handy reference. There is also a list of senators and assemblymen from 1887 to 1891. A table of all code sections affected by the many bills introduced precedes the index.

Chang Yao, governor of the province of Shantung, in China, says the New York Tribune, who died a few weeks ago, was one of the biggest and mightiest officers in the Flowery Kingdom. His career was adventurous in the extreme, and recalls the tales of "The Thousand and One Nights." He was born in the lowest grade of society, and was obliged to flee from his native town when little more than a boy, on account of the murder of an old man. He became a brigand, and was soon leader of the "Free Knights," who made the province of Hanan dangerous for men of family and means. During one of the revolutions in China, according to foreign papers, the rebels were about to capture Krusze, capital of the province. The governor, obliged to adopt drastic measures to save his city and life, issued a proclamation offering the hand of his daughter to the man who would rescue them. Chang did so, won the prize, and eventually became the mandarin and then governor of the city in which he had been a robber.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Noss Jollities held the boards of the Metropolitan last night, and will repeat the programme to-night.

Skipped by the Light of the Moon is a dismal failure in the hands of the troop that essayed it Wednesday night. There never was much merit to the skit anyway.

Sunday night Cleveland's Minstrels will give one of their fine entertainments at the Metropolitan theater. The combination has a good reputation, and it is said the company has been augmented.

This is the way the New York Times speaks of Hoyt's A Trip to Chinatown: The sort of reality marking Mr. Hoyt's other farces is quite lacking, and the stately "student of the drama" will find in it nothing to study. Be he never so stately, however, he will find a vast amount to laugh at—much that is funny and not a little that is humorous. For instance, an invalid who prefers a horse doctor to the ordinary practitioner, because the former is not accustomed to consult the whims of his patients, but gives them what will do them good—that is decidedly a quaint idea. Then to say that Richard III. was a cigarette victim—died of a Richmond straight cut—is, to say the least, not hackneyed. There are numberless things like these during the progress of the trip. The general tone, perhaps, is not lofty. Now and then the young person might be startled, not seriously, but just a little. Of Ollie Archimere (Della Berry) the Times says: A small young person named Ollie Archimere danced in a way that made everybody wish she would do it some more.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

Our Old Grandmother.

What childhood is perfect without the existence and association of grandparents? Among the choicest memories of youth which every human being cherishes with a fondness that only increases as the years pass on is the revered form of grandmother.

How noiselessly the slipped feet move about the house, how softly the cadence of the quivering voice, how gentle her remonstrance, how unobtrusive her questioning, how anxiously does she search for the truant spectacles, and what shining silver pieces does her little old steel purse contain. Surely no one can fill grandmother's niche in the youthful heart.

No one has such supplies of forgiveness and such ready excuses for juvenile offenders; no one has such soft cambric handkerchiefs to wipe away baby tears; no one so sweet a linen cloth to wash soil from infant face; no one so much patience to separate tangled curls.

Where else would a boy whittle on rainy days but by grandmother's hearth? Whose pocket contains such rare lozenges of peppermint or wintergreen to allay childish woes? Who else has red-cheeked apples hidden away to grow rosier? Who has time to so carefully bind up bleeding fingers?

Who else would think to put away dainties for a hungry boy, and what other work basket contains so coveted a piece of well worn beeswax girdled about with tiny tooth prints—the little work basket that on the Sabbath day is hidden away in some mysterious corner and the bible takes its place—grandmother's bible—how sacred are its pages!—N. Y. Recorder.

They Were Not Lighted.

An amusing story is reported from a cathedral town on the coast of England. For many years half a dozen devout old ladies have been in the habit of going, in fine weather or in foul, to the early morning service in the cold minster. Recently it was decided to warm the church, and the old ladies, with one voice, protested against the innovation.

"We shall be suffocated," they declared; "we shall be carried out fainting."

One morning when they arrived for their devotions they found half a dozen stoves set up in various nooks and corners of the cathedral. In the course of the service, therefore, three of the old ladies fainted.

"We knew how it would be," they afterwards said to the dean. But the dean confounded them by assuring them that the new stoves had never been lighted.—Tid-Bits.

The violets that I send to you
Will close their blue eyes on your breast;
I shall not be there, sweet, to see,
Yet do I know my flowers will rest
Within that chaste, white nest.

Oh, little flowers, she'll welcome you
So tenderly, so warmly! Go,
I know where you will die to-night,
But you can never, never know
The bliss of dying so.

If you could speak! Yet she will know
What made your faces wet, although
I fain would follow you and tell her.
There; go and die, yet never know
To what a heaven you go.

—Kate Vannah, in New York Tribune.

Philosophy of the Street.

Hot tempers are like burning strawpiles, principally exhausting to themselves.

There are times when it really looks as though people traveled on their helplessness.

The acme of laziness is to lean on the back of a worker's chair and suggest amendments.

Nothing destroys influence in male or female so fast as getting the name of being a scold.

Persistent waiting on a man will make a helpless imbecile of him faster than filling him with narcotics.

The first indication a woman gives of having a special regard for a man is when she begins to tidy him up.—Milwaukee Journal.

Beyond the clouds—
Away and afar o'er the wood and wold,
Through the misty haze and from mortal
ken,
We will pass away like a tale that's told,
From the sylvian scenes and the marts of
men.

Behind us we'll leave all the sin and pain,
And the dross corporeal and base alloy,
That has soiled our souls. And never again
Shall we look in vain for the face of joy
Beyond the clouds.

Beyond the clouds—
Away and afar through the star strewn ways,
Where the day is bright and the sun ne'er sets

On the glorious glamour that meets our gaze,
Where the night is dead, and its gloom
ne'er frets
Our hearts with its somber and sullen pall—
With its moaning winds and its sobbing rain;

And the mournful voices that come to all,
Shall be hushed for aye and for aye again,
Beyond the clouds.

Beyond the clouds—
Away and afar through the realms of space,
No longer misjudged or misunderstood,
When our dole is done and we take our place
As an airy memory, then let the good
That we tried to do in this vale of tears,
And not what we failed in, be our meed,
While down through the dim of the coming years,
With our sins forgiven, our souls will speed
Beyond the clouds

THE BOTTOMLESS POOL.

The following is the story of a village legend, as told by Walter Besant: It had only one. Most villages have none. This village was proud of its legend; if a cyclist stopped at the public inn for bread and cheese and beer, the landlady, after advising him not to go away without seeing the church, which she understood was very fine, told him of the legend. Like most folk lore it was confused with details. There was a wicked lord and a beautiful lady—his daughter. There was also a young gentleman, poor and proud, who was madly enamored of the young lady. Several variants followed, but the story ended in the drowning of the hapless pair in the Bottomless Pool, no more than ten minutes' walk from the inn. Also, to commemorate the event and keep its memory green, a thunder storm came that very night and carried the church bells out of the tower, and cast them down into the Bottomless Pool, where they still ring knells on stormy nights. After hearing this tale the cyclist would stroll out and visit the Pool, which lay in the corner of a certain field overhung with trees, weird and dark and black—a bottomless pool of the deepest dye. Now, one day there came along two cyclists, and they heard the story, and they went forth to see the Bottomless Pool. Then one of them being a curious and incredulous person—his name was Jack Didymus—pulled forth from his pocket a small ball of twine.

He tied one end of the string to a tree by the side of the pond and walked round to the opposite side, where he placed the other end in the hand of his friend. He then tied a stone to another piece of string, cast it over the first piece and walked half way round so that the stone was over the center and deepest part of the pool. Then he gently lowered the stone. It touched bottom at the prodigious depth of four feet six. He repeated this experiment in various parts of the Bottomless Pool. His soundings gave an average of three feet eight, and at the deepest, four feet eight. "So much," he said, "for the Bottomless Pool." Then they went back to their inn. On the way they met the vicar and dumfounded him with the intelligence. He was a great antiquary and had written a paper on the Bottomless Pool and on analogous legends and similar pools found in Madagascar, Sumatra, Finland and Tasmania. This paper was going to bring him immense fame. He went home and leaned his head upon his hand for an hour or two, feeling very sick. Then he sat up and wrote a sermon, moving enough to convert a cow, on the "Vanity of Human Things." The iconoclastic Didymus and his friend next told the sexton, an ancient man accustomed to lord it over all neighboring sextons on account of the Bottomless Pool.

This poor old man was fain to crawl as far as the inn, where he fortified his failing spirits with a dram, and then another dram and presently another, such was the effect produced upon him by the shattering of his idol. In the evening he was borne home, insensible with grief, by four friends. Next they told the landlady, who immediately sat down with her apron over her head and was left in that posture. And they told the school-mistress on her way to school. She instantly went home, sat down and penned her resignation, for she desired to live in that village no longer. This mischief done, they mounted their iron nags and rode away, heedless of the havoc they had wrought. They have gone. But have they destroyed that legend? No. It still remains. Nothing is ever said about the measurement and the depth of the well. The school-mistress remains at her post. The sexton still takes visitors to see the wonderful pond. The legend, with its Malay, Malagassy and Siberian analogues, has been printed, collated, classified and preserved from possible loss by the Folk Lore Society, and the Bottomless Pool looks blacker, darker, deeper than ever. But the man who measured it died young.

A Naughty Painting.

The painting by Rochegrosse of "The Fall of Babylon," which took up nearly a whole side of one of the biggest rooms in the "Salon," in the Palais de l'Industrie, this year, it is said is coming to the United States for exhibition in all the principal cities. It is a wonderful picture; not quite successful, perhaps, as a whole, but amazingly clever in its way. There has been a grand orgie among the Assyrians, from which but few of the scores of persons represented have recovered, as Cyrus, at the head of his Persian hosts, is seen at the gates of the palace by the gray light of the early morning. Scantily attired dancing women and voluptuaries of the court of Belshazzar, in drunken sleep, fill up the foreground, and the king himself upon his lofty throne is suddenly aroused to the doom that awaits him. The picture is sure to give offense from its daring disregard of American ideas of propriety.—Montezuma, in The Art Amateur.

The Plain Woman.

The women who have been famous in the world have not always been beautiful women, an exchange remarks. A woman who today is very popular among a large circle is never spoken of as a beauty; but whenever anything is got up, whenever any pleasure is to the fore, whenever anybody is in sorrow, whenever anybody wants a confidante, it is Kate who is called for. A man who was asked the explanation of this replied: "It is because she always has a pleasant word for everybody; it is because she always is courteous and considerate; it is because she always looks lady-like and refined, as she is a lady; and, really, it is because she is what a woman would call a 'thoroughly nice girl.'"

There'd be a great deal less fun in the world if there weren't any Irishmen in it. They're always doing something to amuse other people, and not knowing it themselves. There was one of them once watching a German who was playing a trombone. Presently Dutchy laid down his instrument and went out for a beer. Paddy investigated, and promptly pulled the horn to pieces. Dutchy returned. "Who's meddled with my trombone?" he asked, indignantly. "O did," said Paddy. "Here ye've been for two hours tryin' to pull it apart, and I did it in one minute."—Marshall P. Wilder.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. "What dost thou seek in this world by night?
I seek my youth, and I do not know
What path she took, for with footsteps light
She fled, and fast. I can see her go,
Yet never can reach her; and now again
I catch a glimpse through the forest trees
Of her white dress fluttering in the breeze;
I can hear the chink of her dancing chain,
And the ring of her laughter, and see her stay
By the brook to drink; and then I say:
"Dear youth, let me thy distaff touch,
And from thy pitcher drink with thee;
These berries take—thou lovest such!
And on the grass come dance with me." "

—Carmen Sylva.

The Two Misers.

A miser living in Kufa heard that in Basora also there dwelt a miser more miserly than himself, to whom he might go to school, and from whom he might learn much. He forthwith journeyed thither and presented himself to the great master as a humble beginner in the art of avarice, anxious to learn, and under him to become a student.

"Welcome!" said the miser of Bassora; "we will straight go into the market to make some purchases."

They went to the baker.

"Hast thou good bread?"

"Good, indeed, my masters; and fresh and soft as butter."

"Mark this, friend," said the man of Basora to the one of Kufa, "butter is compared with bread as being the better of the two; as we can only consume a small quantity of that, it will also be the cheaper, and we shall therefore act more wisely, and more savingly, too, in being satisfied with butter."

They then went to the butter merchant and asked him if he had good butter.

"Good, indeed, and flavory and fresh as the finest olive oil," was the answer.

"Mark this also!" said the host to his guest, "oil is compared with the very best butter, and therefore by much ought to be preferred to the latter."

They then went to the oil vender.

"Have you good oil?"

"The very best quality; white and transparent as water," was the reply.

"Mark that, too," said the miser of Basora to the one of Kufa, "by this rule water is the very best. Now, at home I have a painful, and most hospitably therewith will I entertain you."

And, indeed, on their return nothing but water did he place before his guest; because they had learned that water was better than oil, oil better than butter, butter better than bread.

"God be praised!" said the miser of Kufa, "I have not journeyed this long distance in vain."

Shy Womankind.

The women have a great propensity for sitting on one foot in a street car as well as in the seclusion of their own homes. It's a great failing of the sex. The ordinary observer would never notice it, probably, because their skirts come too low to tell whether two precious little feet or one are dangling down; but if, when one gets in a car, he will just casually glance along the line, ten chances to one he will find one young lady at least who to all appearances is a hero of the battle of Gettysburg. They do it so skillfully and deftly that nobody but a woman is likely to detect them at it. It is done when she first sits down.

Just as she is about to sit she gives a quick little hitch, which motion is employed to bring the leg up to the seat, and then the rest of the performance proceeds as usual. Thus, like the Turk at his pipe or the tailor at his work, she rides comfortably from the starting place to the destination. There are many advantages in this mode of sitting and few disadvantages. It economizes space in a crowded seat and makes room for one more passenger, so that the gentleman who graciously rises to give up his seat to the lady who has just entered finds to his astonishment that there is still room for him after she has settled down to riding position.

The only great disadvantage is that frequently a lady may tear her skirt when she gets up to leave the car. Or, worse still, she may catch her shoe-heel in the dress or other garment and trip herself. A lady arose from a Pennsylvania car seat the other day and there seemed to be a tugging and a pulling going on under her dress. In a moment there was a long, ripping sound, and she had fallen flat on her face in the bottom of the car. When she arose to her feet to go she trailed about two yards of red braid after her.

What a Woman Can Appreciate.

It takes a woman to appreciate—
An indulgent word when she is peevish and "out of sorts."

A tender word when she has failed in some undertaking.

A gracious word when she has made some slight mistake.

A generous word when she is tired out with petty worries and says something unkind.

An ingenious word when she asks advice upon some important event.

MISCELLANY.

The stingy man is, after all, a brave fellow; he is never known to re-treat.

Whether or not a cheap coat makes a cheap man, there is no question that a seal skin sacque becomes a dear girl.

Troubles are like colds. The only way you can cure them is to wait until they get through of their own accord.

An exchange speaks of a man who "is not a physician but a simple druggist." We had supposed that a druggist was a compound fellow.

The sermon seemed never so long before As once when I waited outside the door In order to see her home in the rain, Then I found my rival had beat me again.

The world deals good-naturedly with good-natured people, and I never knew a sulky misanthropist who quarreled with it but it was he, not it, that was wrong.—Thackeray.

There is a time in every boy's life, when he is about sixteen years old, that he needs one good licking. If he doesn't get it he will believe for the rest of his life that he can lick his father.

That must be one of the beginnings of the millennium, when the progress of "man's humanity to man" has, through the flight of years, swept want and wretchedness into the vale of the past.

The Khedive of Egypt neither smokes nor drinks, and though allowed many wives has only one. He is very learned in Arabic lore, and knows the Koran so thoroughly that he can recite it from memory.

The man who thinks his wife, his baby, his horse, his house, his dog, and himself severally unequalled, is almost sure to be a good humored person, though liable to be tedious at times.—Holmes.

Distressed young mother (with crying baby in railway carriage): "Dear, dear! I don't know whatever to do with this child." Kind and thoughtful bachelor (on the opposite seat): "Shall I open the window for you, madam?"

Time never wrote lines of beauty on a face that carried behind it a double impulse of action, one for the world and one for private life. The face tells the story of the double life and the lines contradict each other. The wayfarer is never tempted to stop them for aid and comfort on his journey.

"The man I wed must be handsome, brave and noble; he must have no bad habits, and must love me devotedly." "But, my dear, that is impossible, you know; quite impossible." "Why?" "Because there is only one such man in all the wide world and he is going to marry me."—Chicago Mail.

The smallest crust may save a human life; The smallest act may lead to human strife; The smallest touch may cause the body pain; The smallest spark may fire a field of grain; The simplest deed may tell the truly brave; The simplest skill may serve a life to save; The smallest draught the thirsty may relieve; The slightest look may make a kind heart grieve;

Naught is so much but it may still contain The rose of pleasure or the thorn of pain.

"I wish I was a star," he said, smiling at his own poetic fancy. "I would rather you were a comet," she said, dreamily. His heart beat tumultuously. "And why?" he asked tenderly, at the same time taking her unresisting little hand in his own; "and why?" he repeated, imperiously. "Oh!" she said, with a brooding earnestness that fell freezing upon his soul, "because then you would come round only once every fifteen years?"

The tragedy of our lives is not created entirely from within. "Character," says Novalis, in one of his questionable aphorisms, "character is destiny." But not the whole of our destiny, Hamlet, prince of Denmark, was speculative and irresolute, and we have a great tragedy in consequence. But if his father had lived to a good old age, and if his uncle had died an early death, we can conceive Hamlet's having married Ophelia and got through life with a reputation of sanity, notwithstanding many soliloquies and some moody sarcasms toward the fair daughter of Polonius, to say nothing of the frankest incivility to his father-in-law.—George Eliot.

Origin of Asia, Europe, Africa, Etc.

Asia means morning or east; Europe, evening or west; Australia means lying to or in the south. Hence, we may consider that these names mean Eastern Land, Western Land, and Southern Land. Asia is a Greek word; Europe is the Hebrew ereb; Australia is a Latin word. The origin of the word "Africa" is uncertain. Some conjecture that it is a Semitic word, meaning "Land of Wanderers."

A Wise Maxim.

Our life is determined for us; and it makes the mind very free when we give up wishing and only think of bearing what is laid upon us, and doing what is given us to do.—George Eliot.

Rev. Joseph Krauskopf, of Philadelphia, delivered a beautiful lecture last month, taking as the subject the review of one of the late Lawrence Barrett's personations of "Shylock." The learned divine makes his text "Shylock—the unhistoric Jew." After some caustic reflections on Christian charity, as disclosed in the grand drama, he thus closes: With all his genius, Shakspeare was after all but a child of his age. Even his knowledge, vast as it was, was hampered by the limitations of the times in which he lived (1564-1616). His knowledge of the Jew was necessarily deficient. It is questioned whether Shakspeare ever visited the continent, where he might have come in contact with Jews. From his own country they had been banished (1290) 300 years before his time, and into it they were not re-admitted till after his death. His knowledge of the Jew he must, therefore, have derived from what he read or heard of them, or from what he saw on the stage, and that was, in his time, almost universally derogatory to the Jewish character. In book, in folk-lore, on stage, the Jew was invariably the villain or the miser. That there were good and respectable Jews, Shakspeare had no chance to know. He knew that the villainous traitor, Judas Iscariot, was a Jew; he probably never knew that the good Jesus, as well as his parents, and brothers, and first apostles and disciples and followers, were also Jews. He knew that the fictitious Barabbas was a Jew, and probably never thought of it that the historic Richard III and King John were Christians. That he was caught by the Jew-hating infection of his time—though, to his credit be it said, in a slighter degree than any other English writer before him, and than many after him—we are assured, when, in his writings, we come across passages such as "a Jew would have wept to have seen our parting" (conveying the idea of the stone-heartedness of the Jew), or when in the witch-scene of Macbeth he requires the "liver of a blasphemous Jew" for their hellish concoction, or when he depicts to us the ravenous craving of the Jew after the Christian's pound of flesh.

He may not even have known that the story of the pound of flesh, which he developed in The Merchant of Venice (written in the year 1598), was an old one, almost as old as myth and legend, and, in one form or another, quite common among ancient oriental and occidental peoples. He may not even have known that in the earlier renditions of this story the villain is never a Jew; that only in the latter renditions, in those made during the times of the bitterest Jewish persecutions, the non-Jewish villain of the earlier stories is suddenly turned into a Jew. He may not even have known that in the only historically recorded event that bears a striking similarity to the Shylock story, and which seems to underlie his own plot, the villain is a Christian, and not a Jew. The story is related in connection with the biography of Pope Sixtus V. (1521-1590). Sechi, a Christian, and Cenade, a Jew, enter into a wager, in which the stake is a pound of flesh, if the Jew loses, and a 1,000 scudi, if the Christian loses. The Jew loses. The Christian swears he will have the pound of flesh. The Jew appeals to the governor, and he appeals to Pope Sixtus, who imposes a heavy fine on each—on the Christian for attempting manslaughter, and on the Jew for hazarding his own life. Thus, the historical (and, at that cruel and persecuting age, the only possible) Shylock is Sechi, the Christian, and the historical Antonio is Cenade, the Jew.

But whether Shakspeare changed the plot to suit the stage-requirements of his time, knowing that with a Christian villain against a Jewish hero, his play would be doomed the very first time brought upon the stage, or whether his plot came to him already falsified, his intentions certainly were not to wrong the Jew any more than he had been wronged; on the contrary, as we were made to see above, if anything, he rather favored the Jew than otherwise. His genius and sense of justice rose, perhaps even unconscious to himself, above his mercenary talents. While his mercenary talents gratified the Jew-hating public, his genius drew in Shylock the briefest, the most classical, the most eloquent, the most widely read and witnessed story of the martyrology of the Jew. So magnificent a piece of workmanship is this play, so subtle its division into an exoteric and an esoteric meaning, that, while the superficial, amusement-seeking reader or auditor laughs or growls at the worsted blood-thirsty Jew, the thoughtful weeps over the unutterable wrongs to a persecuted race. Thanks, many thanks, to the noble Bard of the Avon for his play. Ranking with the best of all his dramas, and one of the purest of them all, free from those shocking murders that mar the beauty of some of the best of his other plays, blending happily the serious with the comic, full of diverse action and picturesque scenery, affording highest histrionic scope for the best actors and actresses, it will continue to hold the boards as one of the most popular of all his plays. And with its continuance the Jew will have a constant and faithful advocate. The unhistoric in its falsified plot will become wider and wider known. The historic part will stand out as a lasting witness to Jewish persecutions and sufferings, and as a constant summons for just and noble reparation.

The poet Dryden must have been impressed with the idea that there is an affinity between genius and insanity when he wrote—

Great wit is sure to madness near allied,
And their partitions do their bounds divide.

Our classics always taught us that genius is the gift of the gods, and is bestowed upon but few mortals. The price they pay for this greatness is often the gift of their lives to some great project, at a total disregard of all the other affairs of life. This fact, perhaps, gives rise to the poetic fancy that with great genius comes an indifference to all other objects than the one which commands their immediate attention; thus being considered insane by reason of those seeming idiosyncracies which, in the ordinary person, would never be noticed. It was one of the doctrines of Plato that delirium was not an evil, but, coming by the gift of the gods, was a benefit. Pascal wrote that extreme intelligence was nearly allied to extreme madness; that the line dividing great genius and insanity was very faint. Genius has been, by our classics, considered a flower immortal blooming on Mt. Parnassus, whose fragrance was the joy of the world. When we come to consider the acts of our greatest inventors and scientists, in a majority of cases they are the most impracticable and simple-minded—actually oblivious to the ordinary concerns of life. In the demonstration of some great scientific matter they do some of the most absurd and ridiculous things. From such acts arises the sentiment that genius and insanity are of kindred and bequests of the gods. How frequently do we find persons who excel in some one accomplishment who are veritable simpletons in the ordinary affairs. A man or woman whose whole soul is wrapped up in music rarely ever possesses any other accomplishment. So with eminent professors of science; they are so absorbed in their pursuits that they are unversed in anything else. There is in this city a young woman about eighteen years of age who is a marvel in mathematics; yet her mind seems to be almost a blank on everything else; indeed, she is physically and mentally a weakling, save only her remarkable gift in mathematics.

Philologists have sought for our primitive mother tongue for centuries on the banks of central Asia. Darwin attributes our origin to the monkey, and now comes Prof. Garner, who proposes to go to the fountain head of our primeval speech. "Monkey talk" is the object he has in view, and he intends to go to Africa where communion will be held with apes, gorillas and members of the monkey family, through the medium of the phonograph. What ultimate good can result from this enterprise it is difficult to comprehend.

The President's message is a lengthy state paper. It is difficult to condense or make very brief such a document at this time, when there are so many grave matters to consider. The President has, in a clear and unostentatious manner, and without an indulgence in platitudes, given a resume of the situation of all the departments and affairs of national importance. The Chile question is presented to congress with the conclusion that unless Chile promptly makes reparation the matter will be again the subject of a message which will mean extreme measures. The two great questions—tariff and silver—the President recommends that all the existing laws relating thereto be given a full trial in order that the great business interests may be spared the distressing influences which accompany radical changes. Free coinage of silver would, under existing conditions, disastrously affect our business interests at home and abroad. Suitable legislation is recommended regarding the Chinese exclusion in order that courts may not conflict in the construction of the act. He considers the interpretation placed upon the act by some courts, that it means that the Chinamen shall be returned to the immediate country from which they came, as incorrect, and that they must be returned to China. The consideration of the rights of railroad employes, and that railroad companies should provide for the better protection of their employes from death and injury, certainly addresses itself to the intelligence as well as the humanity of congress. Under most of the state statutes there is no redress for the injury or death of an employe. A very careful consideration is given to the question of the method of choosing presidential electors, and the abuse that might follow the district plan through the process of gerrymandering. The message will be instructive reading to all citizens, who cannot fail to obtain much information on governmental affairs therefrom. It is not within the compass of an editorial article to review such a document, as the subjects treated therein are as briefly mentioned as it would be possible in an editorial.

The first election held under the new ballot system in Sacramento transpired on Monday. It did happen an editor of this paper occupied the dual position of a citizen and a candidate. Truly, the office for which he had been named was of little consequence, if judgment is to be based upon the sparsity of the votes that were cast. However it was, opportunity was afforded to judge of the workings of the new system. There is nothing wrong with the system itself, but like all new things in legislation, some did criticise unjustly. It is impossible that a law can be devised that will carry with it the furnishment of brains to those who will be selected to execute. Our observation was that the voters understood it better than did some of the election officers, whose duty it was to have posted themselves in advance. In 1884 the writer ran for the office of assemblyman, the compensation being but $480. Though the campaign did last but three days, it cost more to us than the entire salary. Beset we were with strikers on every hand; against the dictates of conscience we were compelled, under the menace of defeat, to yield up our money; felt the extortion, too, as more cowardly than highway robbery, in that, in the latter case, in resisting, the victim has the advantage of the protection of the law should he kill the robber. On Monday we found it different. Our assessment, which, of course, was legitimate, amounted to but $10. We presume the experience of the opposing candidate was about the same.

In the third ward by mutual agreement between the competing candidates, an opportunity was afforded, so nearly as they could conserve, to practically demonstrate the workings of the new law. Immediately when the deliberations of the nominating bodies had reached culmination, a compact between the candidates was entered into, in general effect that each would protect the other against calumnious attack; that the canvass would be conducted as between gentlemen, and that at the hour of the opening of the polls, so far as each was concerned, the case would be submitted to the jury—the people. Manifestly, there was wisdom in this action, in that any man of sense does know that defamation, when used by one, becomes a sword of double edge, and that under the new election law it is useless to attempt to influence the voters on election day. The strikers were not in it; the candidate was permitted to feel that he stood on equal footing with his fellow-men, and that he could not be bled by conscienceless money-bleeders.

Will there ever be a man perfect? An unhappy philosopher, if we remember aright our earlier reading, did pass through the streets of Athens in the hours of darkness; did carry with him a lantern, and did look inquiringly into the countenances of his fellows. To their inquiries he did reply: "I seek an honest man." There was irony in the philosophy of the sage. Were he now in life, perhaps he would be impelled to travel from Athens to Sacramento to find a perfect man. Perfection in humanity hath never been attained; it never will be. From the estimate we are compelled to draw in the sacred scroll, Adam was a coward, in that he did wrong and sought to cast the blame upon a woman. The time did come when the taint of corruption did necessitate the destruction of all mankind, save Noah and his immediate relatives. Noah was not perfect, in that he did celebrate his return to dry land by a debauch. Lot was the purest man of Sodom and Gomorrah; his record is not beyond adverse criticism. Diogenes, after having wasted his younger life in revelry and dissipation, did become the cynic philosopher, and made his permanent residence in a tub; he was too wise for the age in which he lived, and too pure to mingle with the common herd. It would not surprise us if on some morning we will discover the leaders of what is known as the great "reform" sandwiched in a hogshead, and that to the people they will say: "Behold the embodiment of purity! the touch of the Philistines will be to us contamination; we will, however, do the thinking for you." We esteem it, did a monarch of the world now exist; one who had cried that he did find no other nations to conquer, it would hardly be he would exclaim, when he would look into the Sacramento barrel: "Were I not Alexander the Great, I would be one of the owners of the great reform." The chances are, as we esteem the sentiment of this people as it was expressed on Monday, Alexander would have quietly directed that the barrel be securely headed and cast into the river. These remarks may seem severe; they are, however, just. The few who did assume to control the action of the persons we refer to did meet in secret and did attempt to stigmatize a candidate for a public office, without affording him an opportunity for a hearing. Concerning this action, that candidate did during the canvass maintain silence; felt as did Mr. Seward when the threat of the know-nothings was directed against him: "I am an American citizen; to no secret power do I kneel, save one—my God." It is rather gratifying there has been a public protest against the revival of the inquisition of the dark ages, and against the transplantation to the soil of America of Russian injustice—secret condemnation, without a hearing.

To the people of the third ward an editor of this paper renders a sincere acknowledgment of gratitude. He does fully realize the responsibility cast upon him; forsees the harassments with which he will be beset. At times there will be the appeals of sympathy, on the one hand—appeals that to refuse will smite the heart of man; on the other hand the stern mandate of public duty. Easy enough it will be to offset political intrigue, in that it will come in most cases in the envelope of selfishness.

The weirdest manifestation of the spiritual influence to which the human body is subjected is to be found in the expression of a blind person's face. If you want to arrive at a real understanding of the mysterious life within life, which surrounds us, and which is upon us, search studiously the lineaments of the blind, and you will then know what kind of hidden force is the soul that has wrought so ineffable an expression. The natural air of a blind face is that of repose. It is right that this should be; for we believe silence to be with darkness, and peace to be with silence. There are few faces that have light upon which, in their hours of repose, may not be found an expression as of hungeriness, waxing fainter or more powerful as we search down the gradations of intellect. Life communicates to the eyes of those that can see a light which beams upon you with a sense of want—an expression of unrest—a thirsty desire to solve fresh mysteries. The suggestiveness of being finds a reflected inquisitiveness in the open eyes of all. Take the meanest eyes that ever gazed upon the enduring glories of God's universe, and, keenly scrutinizing them, you will read an intelligence incorporated with their own normal consciousness which stamps on the face a thirstiness not to be found on the face of the blind. This incorporated intelligence is the knowledge of things inspired by the world's show. It has slid into the expression of their eyes unknown to themselves. It lives within the light of the eyes like the memories with which some glances are pregnated. It is the life of the eye that is two-fold; firstly, the light with which it has been created; secondly, the light which it has had communicated. This second light is the deeper mystery. By it the expression of the lineaments is stated, and because this light is the embodied, deep inquisitiveness inspired by the suggestiveness of the surrounding life, so the faces of those who are not blind have ever upon them an expression of desire which grows with the time through which they live.

The peace interpenetrating the lineaments of the blind is the fruit of the silence which is upon their spirits through the darkness with which they are encompassed. A sense of this surpassing peace is only communicated to you when you watch the blind in the hour of their repose. The sounds of life, the accents of human voices, the murmur of innumerable things will agitate this repose; and at such times its weird beauty is without impressiveness. We glean these facts from the experience of those who have had the care of the blind. There are periods when repose will descend upon the spirit like a sense of sleep; it is in this slumbrous wakefulness that the true expressions of all come out, just as the images of things in water will grow visible as the agitation on the surface subsides and a calm settles upon it. Then the manifestations of the inwrought peace upon the face of the blind takes place in all its startling mystery of beauty. The yearning look which the blind sometimes wear, when you meet them in the streets, or watch them listening amidst audiences, is not the true expression of their spiritual being; it is an expression that is born from a renewal of their ancient inner activity by the sounds that are about them. Their true expression is to be found in the brow which seems to shine out of the very darkness of the mind that imparts to it its wondrous peace; in the lips that are parted and motionless; because what whispers go on within are uttered in darkness, and need no movement of the lips to render their significance intelligible, for the blind do not talk to themselves; in the eyebrows which are contracted with no sense of light, no consciousness of scorn, no eagerness of knowledge, no rigor of meditation. The mystic beauty of the expression of the blind face is full of the deep poetry of pathos.

The seeing can have no feelings in common with the sightless—with those whose spirits seem living a life inconceivable and unknown to us who bask in the light of the all-brightening sun, find joy and music and poetry in the flushing of flowers, the voluptuous swaying of summer trees, the hazy glory of stars and skies. The souls of the blind live the life of deep consciousness, which is self-listening, self-inspiring, self-acting, owing nothing to outer suggestions, instructive or absolute; arguing with spiritual logic, which is consequential only to itself, because it ignores all principles of positive and relative, of precedent and comparison. They live in the world of darkness, where the black skies of those who were not born blind are streaked across with the unilluminating, mystic, pale light of memory. In this darkness they converse with the echoes of palpable voices; they hear the vibration of incommunicable music; dreams of form and substance float before them and inspire them with all the thoughts they have. The mystery that follows the departure of light is upon them. They live and move and have their being in a weird, phantom world of thought that has no relation with the thought of the lighted life. Their expectancy is not ours. It is the expectancy that is born, not of the sights of the world, but of things that move in darkness. Yet there are well-loved spirits that throng that limitless universe of darkness; familiar faces, whose light is communicated by the spiritual eyes that gaze and woo, look from the impalpable profound and speak in voices whose tones resemble the innumerable moans that fill the air when we sit and think upon a summer's sleeping night. The world of blackness is still a world of love. Into darkness as well as into light the heart will carry its own beautiful affections. The new life into which the blind enter changes these affections into likenesses that bear no resemblance to our own, because they are purged, perhaps, of much of their materiality. But if they are more refined, more immaterial, more divine in their essence, they are not less strong in their hold, less inspiring in their presence, less wonderful in their creativeness. So here we behold in operation the sublime and generous law of compensation. At the sacrifice of their sweet, subduing fancies, the weirdly, lovely affections, the spiritual faces, the vague array of subtle and impalpable dreams, with which the blind have accustomed the world of darkness to their hearts, how many would return to the life of the light of the sun?

AGE AND SONG.

In vain men tell us time can alter
Old loves or make old memories falter,
That with the old year the old year's life closes.
The old dew still falls on the old sweet flowers,
The old sun revives the new-fledged hours,
The old summer rears the new-born roses.

Much more a Muse that bears upon her
Raiment, and wreath, and flower of honor,
Gathered long since and long since woven,
Fades not or falls as falls the vernal
Blossoms that bear no fruit eternal,
By summer or winter charred or cloven.

No time casts down, no time upraises
Such loves, such memories, and such praises,
As need no grace of sun or shower,
No saving screen from frost or thunder,
To tend and house around and under
The unperishable and peerless flower.

Old thanks, old thoughts, old aspirations,
Outlive men's lives and lives of nations,
Dead, but for one thing which survives—
The inalienable and unpriced treasure,
The old joy of power, the old pride of pleasure,
That lives in light above men's lives.

—Algernon Charles Swinbourne.

Never contradict a painter in a theater. He always wants to make a scene.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Although managers pay a popular singer big prices, they do not conceal the fact that they want her services for a song.

If a man is to be judged by the company he keeps, some theatrical managers will have a "red hot time" in the next world.

The greatest success of the twenty years has been the Cloches de Corneville. It ran in London for 600 nights. Comic opera scored the second place as well as the first. The Mascotte and La Fille de Mme. Angot ran for over 400. When we get into the 300-night pieces, we have again comic opera, in the Petit Duc and in Miss Helyett, a piece still running at the Bouffes, Paris, and running in the London Criterion under another name. Then at last we get to a real play, and the Maitre de Forges appears on the list. But it is not the plays that run longest that make most money. Michael Strogoff caps the list with receipts of nearly 3,000,000f.; after it comes Mme. Angot with 2,500,000f.; then Offenbach's Orfee, and then, and not till then, Theodora, with Sarah Bernhardt.

There are many songs which were composed in the time of Charles II, whose music is in vogue to-day, whose words were of the most infamous description originally. Henry Purcell, to the shame of the epoch be it said, brought forth many of these. But since even Shakspeare at times descended to the level of his age we need not too bitterly blame the musical genius (the greatest that England ever produced) for trying to earn an occasional shilling by turning out such wicked musical compositions. Some of the early English ballads tell of times of persecution, of bigotry and of intolerance. Naturally these musical works have undergone transformation in modern times; but one, "The Jew's Daughter," has remained intact, and tells of the murder of Hugh, of Lincoln, which took place A. D. 1255, and was charged upon the Jews of Lincoln, of whom over 200 hundred were brought to London and tried with torture for a mythical crucifixion of the unfortunate lad. The tale of ancient jealousy has come down to our time in the song, "O Waly, Waly, Up the Bank," which refers to the separation of Lord Jamie Douglas from his wife. The original tale reads much like the plot of Shakspeare's Othello, for there was an Iago in the shape of a certain Lowrie of Blackwood, secretary to Douglas, and in default of the fatal handkerchief which plays so important a part in the Shakspearean tragedy this wicked man placed a pair of boots in such wise that the jealousy of the marquis was aroused and a pathetic separation followed, of which few who sing the song know anything. Some of the odd transformations of songs are due to what must originally have been something very like theft. Thus "Willie, We Have Missed You," is only a paraphrase of the famous Scotch song, "Jock o' Hazeldean." The yet more celebrated "John Anderson, My Jo," is suspiciously like "When Johnnie Comes Marching Home Again," a popular song of war times. But sometimes these resemblances to the Scotch music come about very innocently. A strathspey is changed into "Oft in the Stilly Night," and this is by no means a distant relative to "Nearer, My God, to Thee," thus making a favorite hymn tune first cousin to an ungodly and very energetic dance. Such changes might occur through the unconscious retention of a tune in the mind, as once happened to Mendelssohn while composing "Elijah." He had heard "Auld Robin Gray" sung to Leever's tune (this popular melody is not the original tune which went with the words), and the melody clung to his memory without his being aware of the fact. When, therefore, he set the words of "Oh, Rest in the Lord," to the extreme horror of the publisher he used Leever's tune without in the least being conscious of plagiarism. When his attention was drawn to the fact he altered the melody, but the careful observer will still discover something of the flavor of "Auld Robin Gray" in "Oh, Rest in the Lord." Many of the songs of the German students have been stolen and reproduced in new guises on this side of the Atlantic. "Maryland, My Maryland," for example, is note for note the old German song "O Tannebaum," a song in praise of fidelity. The simple little song so often heard in kindergarten or Sunday school as "Oh, Come, Come Away," is one of the most popular of the student songs, but in Germany it represents the merits of a very fiery punch called "Crambambuli." Our national music is full of metamorphoses akin to those mentioned above. "Yankee Doodle" being old English, "The Star-Spangled Banner" a jovial drinking song, and "America" the English national anthem. Even the hymnology is not exempt from these importune resemblances, for "Sun of My Soul" is not very far from Mozart's "Se Vuol Bellare," and many other instances of metamorphoses might be cited, but enough has been noted to prove that Solomon's saying, "There is no new thing under the sun," may be very strongly applied to music.

Book Chat.

The author of those touching lines entitled "Beautiful Snow" will probably receive treatment in a separate chapter of Superintendent Porter's forthcoming census report. No single locality can claim the honor of his, or her, birthplace.

Robert J. Burdette, the humorist, is to go into the editorial harness again. With January 1 he will become a salaried editor on the staff of The Ladies' Home Journal, and will conduct a regular department in each issue of that periodical.

The letters of General Sherman to his daughter, now running in the Cosmopolitan Magazine, throw a new light upon the character of the man who is known to his generation as a warrior. Theodore Davis, who sat at Sherman's mess table during the campaigns of which he writes, supplements the Sherman letters by a very interesting paper of his own, and a number of sketches which he made at the time.

The cabalistic book of Sohár gives a parable to illustrate the approach of truth to man. Truth is a beautiful woman, who first gives a gentle hint which none but a true lover can discover; next she whispers through a thick veil that hides her entire form; then she converses through a thin veil which discloses the outlines of her beauty; at last she shows her glorious face and intrusts him with the secrets of her heart.

In the sixteenth century we find the greatest extravagance displayed in the titles of books. These may be taken as examples: "The Spiritual Snuff Box, to Lead Devoted Souls to Christ;" and "The Spiritual Seringa for Souls Steeped in Devotion." A work on Christian charity published in 1587 is entitled "Buttons and Button Holes for Believers' Breeches." The editor of this department has Father La Chaucie's work, entitled "Bread Cooked on the Ashes; Brought by an Angel to the Prophet Elighah [Elijah] to Comfort the Dying." Another was issued with the curious title of "The Lamp of S. Augustine, and the Flies that Flit Around It." The following very attractive title appeared in a book published at Newcastle in 1605: "Some Beautiful Biscuits Cooked in the Oven of Charity and Put Aside for the Fowls of the Church, the Sparrows of the Spirit and the Swallows of Salvation."

Mr. Clarence King, of New York, himself a charming writer, takes a very melancholy view of literature in the east. He says that Boston has been dead, as a producer of literature, for ten years, and that New York is in a moribund condition. The society mania, he asserts, is working evil in New York. The rage is continually for balls, parties, receptions, and those other hollow flatteries to which men naturally incline and which fashionable society loves to tender. As soon as a young writer is recognized in New York he is pounced upon and lionized by society. That means an end to work. The club and the drawing-room are thus killing off literature; vanity and ostentation are driving out the muse. Mr. King estimates that for the next hundred years no literature worth mentioning will be produced in the east. To the west he looks for all of merit that is to come. "Why is it," asks Mr. King, "that the love stories of the present time are so lacking in virility? The love of which our literature treats nowadays is a sickly, superficial sentiment; there is neither manhood nor womanhood in it. It is false, and therefore bad. Why doesn't somebody kick out of the traces and give us a healthy, natural, strong, virile love story?"

George W. Childs, of the Philadelphia Ledger, entertained Sir Edwin Arnold at dinner recently, at his private residence near Philadelphia. Two Japanese ladies graced the festive board, and the distinguished guest is said to have fairly scintillated in the Light of Asia. At the banquet tendered him in New York last week, Sir Edwin pronounced himself "a darn Britisher who rejoices to think that her majesty, the sovereign, is the best and noblest of all noble ladies," but he puts this country up alongside of England. "Between these two majestic sisters of the Saxon blood the hatchet of war is, please God, buried." Regarding the English speech, he said: "Let us all try to keep in speech and in writing as close as we can to the pure English that Shakspeare and Milton, and, in these latter times, Longfellow, Emerson, and Hawthorne have fixed. It will not be easy. To the treasure house of that noble tongue, the United States have splendidly contributed. It would be far poorer to-day without the tender cares of Longfellow, the serene and philosophic pages of Emerson, the convincing wit and clear criticism of my illustrious departed friend, James Russell Lowell, and the Catullus-like perfection of the lyrics of Edgar Allan Poe, and the glorious, large-tempered dithyrambs of Walt Whitman. These stately and sacred laurel groves grow here in a garden forever extending, ever carrying further forward for the sake of humanity the irresistible flag of our Saxon supremacy." The editor of the Daily Telegraph is evidently ingratiating himself with the Americans, and if he keeps up this sort of thing his visit will be a great success.

Mr. Brooks Adams, in a speech in Boston the other evening, related that when the great Calumet copper mine was first opened in the wilderness of Michigan the miners struck for higher wages. "But won't higher wages ruin the company?" was asked. "Not at all," was the reply; "we don't care what we pay the miners so long as we own the grocery store."

An interesting little war story has Gov. Jones, of Alabama, for its hero. At the time Gordon was resisting Sherman's advance, Jones, then a staff captain, was delivering a message from his chief, when he saw a little child, clad only in night clothes, hiding in terror behind a frame house in the direct tracks of the bullets from each army. Jones rode forward, took the child on his horse and galloped back with her to the confederate line. When the union forces saw the act they ceased firing, and there was an impromptu cessation of hostilities until the child had been carried to a point of safety.

The epicurean philosophy is the religion of pleasure—a popular religion nowadays. The ancient founder of this school, Epicurus, condemned religion in every form, as do his modern disciples. He taught that this life is the only one, and made pleasure the summum bonum. Yet he recommended the practice of the virtues, not on their own account, but for the sake of pleasure. He was himself practically temperate, ate sparingly of the plainest food, drank little and always attested that this was best for health, and therefore for enjoyment. He framed this maxim: "He lives most pleasantly who lives most temperately."

In a recent English case an enthusiastic amateur played daily eight hours on a violoncello, and on Sundays sometimes a little longer. To add to the misery caused, the player lived in a flat. The judge before whom the case was tried, decided that three hours was long enough for any human being to play on a violoncello, and issued the injunction. In another English case a chime of bells at Deptford was not allowed to ring, because the noise was offensive to the majority of the property-owners in the vicinity. In New York a person was brought up before the Court of Common Pleas some time ago for trundling in a carriage overhead his teething baby, both by night and by day. The judge, who must have been a married man, held that the noise was not unreasonable, and refused to interfere. The newspapers recently mentioned the sad case of a discharged chorister, who took a horrible revenge on the congregation by sitting in a pew and purposely singing out of tune. Whether he was indicted or not for disturbing public worship does not appear. Many annoying sounds have from time to time been alleged as nuisances, but the courts have held that some of them must be endured.

"About a year ago," says a Brooklyn clergyman, "a woman who had been deceived by her lover by means of a 'mock marriage,' and who had discovered the fraud, came to me with her tale of woe and asked my advice. She was living with the man she supposed to be her husband, but believed that he was about to desert her. I thought the matter over and told her to arrange a little party at her house and to invite me as her friend, but not as a minister of the gospel, and at an opportune time propose to her lover that they show their friends how they were married 'in fun.' She was a bright little woman and carried out my instructions to the letter. The people in the house, when I went there, knew of the existing conditions and readily entered into the scheme, prompted by curiosity to see how a 'mock marriage' was performed. I was pressed into service by the woman on the plea that I had a brother in the church. I took a bible she provided and married them fast, and made out the certificate in due form. Then I had an interview with the man. He was very angry at first, but came around all right, and he and the little woman are now living together very happily. That isn't the way most 'mock marriages' end, but it would be a good way to do it."

NOTES.

An old discussion, whether canvasback or redhead are best is on again. Meanwhile many are content with pork and beans.

No animal has more than five toes, digits, or claws to each foot or limb. The horse is one-toed, the ox two-toed, the rhinoceros is three-toed, the hippopotamus is four-toed, and the elephant and hundreds of other animals are five-toed.

Some senseless fellow started a rumor against the Sacramento Bank which caused a run yesterday afternoon. There was no possible foundation for any alarm, and the bank authorities quietly paid every depositor who presented his book.

Civilization does not seem to be friendly to bird life. Ten specimens of North American birds are put down by the ornithologists as "missing." Of these two—the great auk and the Labrador duck—are believed to have become extinct within the memory of living men.

We are apt to think that superstition is dead, or at least confined to the ignorant and illiterate. But this is far from being correct. Recently, for instance, in St. Louis, a large building in one of the best business streets of the city was torn down simply because it was thought to be "hoodooed."

Lucy Hooper writes from Paris that she has seen in a jeweler's shop there the most marvelous pearl necklace of modern times. It took its former possessor twenty years to collect the pearls of which it is composed. The necklace is valued at $120,000, and is designed to be a present by the Czar to his wife.

A novel residence, which has just been finished, and is situated in Hamburg, has been made entirely of paper boards, which, it is said, are of the hardness of wood, but possess an advantage over the latter material in that they are fireproof, this desirable end being effected by impregnation with certain chemical solutions.

Celery is a splendid nerve stimulant, besides being cooling and refreshing. It is a fact, that when one of our men of muscle is training for an encounter, he will eat as much as three bunches of celery at each meal. Lima beans, peas, spinach, and oyster plant, all deserve a word of commendation for their usefulness to mankind.

Victoria's favorite flower is the dark-red rose; not the Jaque, but a deeper red than that. Prince Albert loved the first gay yellow primrose of spring; and Victoria now, in adoration of his memory, causes primroses to be plucked by the river's brink, or wherever else they can be found, and orders that they be brought to her to divide favors with the dark-red love rose of which she is so fond.

We are having our periodical wonder in the person of a woman who has the marks of the crucifixion. This silly nonsense about anything supernatural is tiresome. However, just about Christmas time these little fictions arise, and the devout look wise and say: "How wonderful is this visitation." That there could be any religious significance in such cases is too absurd for even a thought.

The excess of women and girls over men and boys, in Great Britain, is 900,000, an increase of 200,000 in ten years. In Germany the number of females in excess of males is about 1,000,000. In Sweden and Norway the "weaker sex" is in the majority by about 250,000; in Austro-Hungary by 600,000, and in Denmark by 60,000. In the United States, Canada and Australia the males are in the majority. In this country there are about 1,000,000 more men than women.

There is something queer about a woman who has not a fear of cows, mice, burglars and Gypsies. It does not affect the matter that vicious cows are seldom met with, that the mouse is perfectly harmless, that burglars are few and generally innocuous, and that Gypsies who steal children are to be met with only in novels or theatrical performances. It would be logical if strange servant girls were substituted for Gypsies in the catalogue of terrors, as a result of the Beals abduction in Kansas City, but the logical will not follow.

The custom of covering with cloth or turning to the wall the pictures and mirrors in a house on the occasion of a death therein takes us back to early Greek and Jewish times, and is a modernized expression of some sentiment that caused Jews and Greeks to rend their clothing and to put ashes on their heads when they lost a dear friend. These people, to express their sorrow at such times, receded as far as possible in habit and behavior from their ordinary customs, and this same sentiment operating in more modern times attacked the pictures and mirrors as the brightest and most enlivening objects. The custom is becoming obsolete.

A New York preacher has evinced a little light of reason and common sense in denouncing the practice of allowing young girls to teach the "heathen Chinese" at the mission schools. There is about as much probability of instilling into the mongolian mind Christian religion as there is to teach a monkey any religious faith. These foolish and sentimental maidens are only made the object of ridicule by this same heathen after her vain endeavor to teach him the ways of the Christian doctrines. Attractive young ladies are the attraction that draws the wily heathen, not religion. It is the desire to sit beside these pretty teachers that causes them to assume a devout manner. The wonder is that there have not been some strange sensations emanating from this mockery of religion. Indeed the reverend gentleman warns parents against permitting their daughters to teach in these alleged missions. Our young ladies could find better occupations than attempting to teach these heathens.

We have been frequently asked for the census returns of this county. The following is the population of Sacramento county by townships: Alabama, 414; American, 648; Brighton, 1,282; Center, 383; Cosumnes, 443; Dry Creek, 963; Franklin, 1,885; Georgiana, 1,311; Granite, 1,970; Lee, 541; Mississippi, 316; Natoma, 318; Sacramento city, 26,386; San Joaquin, 1,383; Sutter, 2,096. Total, 40,339. The town of Folsom has 699; Elk Grove, 202; Walnut Grove, 212; Galt was not segregated by the local enumerator. The seven wards of Oakland has 48,682. If we include the surroundings of Oakland there should be added 12,040, which would make 60,722. The population of San Francisco is 298,997; Los Angeles, 50,395; San Diego, 16,159; San José, 18,050; Stockton, 14,424; Woodland, 3,069; Marysville, 3,991; Napa City, 4,395; Grass Valley, 6,798; Nevada City, 2,524; Fresno, 10,622; Eureka City, 4,858; Berkeley, 5,101; San Rafael, 3,290; Salinas, 2,399; San Bernardino City, 4,012; Santa Barbara, 5,864; Santa Clara, 2,891; Petaluma, 3,692; Red Bluff, 2,608; San Buena Ventura City, 2,320; Tulare City, 2,697; Chico, 2,894; Oroville, 1,787; Martinez, 1,600.

Another Homily on Poker.

W. J. Florence was very fond of the game of poker, and was regarded as a most excellent player. In some very interesting notes on the game written by him occurs the following:

As in any game of chance or speculation, there are in poker opportunities to cheat. Long before poker, however, was even invented cheating at chance games was practiced by the unprincipled. I have seen loaded dice taken from the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum and now preserved in the government museum at Naples. So poker is not responsible for all the charges brought against it.

It is well, however, to be careful about going into a game of poker on an ocean steamer, in a railway carriage or a western hotel without some knowledge of your companions.

Whatever its origin, poker is now conceded to be one of the most intellectual, as it is doubtless the most fascinating of card games. Attack and defence are in it developed to an amazing perfection, the opportunities of seizing strategic advantage being wonderful.

Cable says: "A man who can play delightfully on a guitar and keep a knife in his boot would make an excellent poker player." And it is just as well to remember that it is not at all necessary to talk. In making bets the simple pushing up of the chips registers the bet. The father of American poker, Gen. Bob Schenck, said: "The main elements of success are good luck, good cards, plenty of cheek and good temper." Richard Guernale, in his "Poker Book," adds: "and plenty of patience." To these it is not misplaced here to add this: "Push your luck when winning, stay out when losing, until a little better hand than the average comes to you."

A great many players of experience recommend standing pat occasionally on two small pairs. This is unwise, as the only hand which is liable to be driven out is a hand which is just a little better. Almost any player with "aces up" or three of a kind will call a pat hand, particularly if the pot be a large one, and to stand pat on two pairs against an inferior hand is to waste your resources.

To play a hand pat, the limit should be raised both before and after the draw, and the game will seldom be found to be worth the candle. The only hand to stand pat on, other than a genuine one, is a hand without a pair and nothing to draw to.

In the southern states players consider it almost a point of honor to stand pat on a hand called a "killer"—that is, a hand with the nine for the highest and a two for the lowest card. It is impossible to make anything of such a hand by drawing, and the only thing to be done is to discard the whole or play pat.

When a player finds threes in his hand on the first deal he at once recognizes the fact that it may be improved to either a full hand or fours. There is no other increase of value possible. Once in every twenty-three and a half times four of a kind may be made by drawing two cards to threes. Just twice as often, or about once in twelve times, a full hand may be made. It is possible, therefore, to improve this hand by drawing just once in every eight times.

A favorite play is to retain an odd card, discarding and drawing one card, and thus accomplishing the valuable result of deceiving one's rivals as to the strength of the hand. The probabilities of improving the hand are, of course, much less, four of a kind being possibly made in this way only once in forty seven times. One-card draw will result in a full hand about once in sixteen times. The one-card draw creates the impression that the hand is either a straight, a flush or two pairs. It seems to be the opinion of good judges that, as three of a kind is nineteen times out of twenty a good enough hand to win the pot, it offers the possessor a very wide range to win for the exercise of his own judgment in the draw. It matters not how the draw is made, the hand is bound to remain good, and may be improved. For this reason the policy of masking the hand is often advisable; for the one-card draw, especially, is calculated to create an appearance of bluffing, indicating a draw to a bobtail straight or flush.

Some excellent authorities on poker say that with three of a kind it is almost always best to hold up a card and draw one.

While it seems a little paradoxical to talk about drawing cards to a hand which is dealt to you in its complete form, such as a full, yet it often occurs that, for reasons of the moment, it is advisable to discard the pair and draw two cards; or, more probably, to throw away one of the associate pair and draw one. Where there are only a few playing, and a full hand with aces or kings pat is dealt, it is better to mask the strength of the hand by throwing away the small pair, or one of them at least, retaining the three aces or three kings. But this, of course, is largely a matter for individual taste and the emergency of the moment.

The larger the number of players in a game the better play it is to draw one card to a bobtail flush or straight. As far as the element of chance goes, it must be remembered that the four cards are of absolutely no value without the odd fifth, which is to be drawn, except so far as bluffing is concerned. There is no earthly probability of a bobtail winning on its merits, consequently the only chance of winning is of improving the hand. It is hardly worth while to take the risk unless the pot is one of considerable size.

Drawing to a straight with both ends open is a very good play, as the odds are only about six to one against its being made. But drawing to an intermediate straight is taking a chance of one in twelve. A flush, according to the calculus of probabilities, should on a one card draw be made nine times out of forty-seven.

After the discarding comes the betting. Primarily the better, or the player on whom the duty of betting or "passing out" first devolves, is the second to the dealer's left. He bets first or goes out, and each player after him has the privilege of either "seeing" what he has bet, raising it or passing out. When in this way the turn of the age is reached he may raise up to the limit or simply "see" the highest bet already made, and the advantage of his position is such that nobody can "raise" him. His "seeing" calls for a "show down" of hands.

That form of betting known as bluffing, which, by some, is erroneously supposed to so characterize the game of draw poker as to give it, actually, the name of "bluff" in some localities, is a necessary part of the game as best played. But it cannot be denied that many poker players do get through an evening without once resorting to it. The fact that they pretend to bluff, or bluff at bluffing, has, however, the desired result in producing an erroneous impression on the minds of their companions at table, producing such impressions being indeed a sine qua non to success. For the player known never to bluff is never "called," except on some hand shown by experience to be probably superior to his. Successful bluffs are almost impossible in "jack pots."

Half-breed Joe.

"Ride?" said the colonel, "there's nothing in the world can touch an Indian for riding. He can ride on a pony's neck, on his side, on his flank—he can ride under a pony, for I have seen him do it many a time."

"And now that we are on the subject of riding, I'll tell you about a ride that a half-breed Indian made once. I never liked half-breeds before that any more than I liked Indians. I don't like half-breeds now, but I liked that critter Joe."

"Joe started off to the south on an easy lope. You could see the Indians move where they had rested like a shadow on the plain. Then out came a circle like the curve of a band of blue swallows. It spread out, widening and widening, and circled in again like a closing fan, after Joe. All the while Joe was loping over the white plain to the south. They were after him at a hot pace, and Will gnawed his moustache as he watched his half-breed getting smaller and smaller. He was riding harder now, and the pursuing Indians were between him and the train. The soldiers could see puffs of white where the Indians were sending balls after the half-breed, and then the speck of a Joe went out of sight and afterward the band, only a fine cloud of alkali dust showing where it floated over them.

"Will was an awfully reckless fellow. He didn't believe that the Indian lived who would fight face to face with a man. He used to say he would take ten men and ride through a whole tribe, shooting whatever men he chose, and that they wouldn't show fight if he could keep them from closing in behind him."

"He got his chance one day. He was escorting a supply-train wagon, you know, across the plains. He had about twenty infantrymen with him. A swarm of Indians came down upon him and began to blaze away. They fired like a hail-storm. He got the wagon rounded up and then tried to make the Indians come in and fight him. Not a bit of it would they have. They hung around like a swarm of bees just out of range. Every time he got the train in motion down they came again with a whoop. They were losing mules, and Will was raving, cursing mad. He couldn't make them fight him."

"So then they stayed. That night the red devils led them a terrible dance, but they stuck it out. The next day was one of those scorching, blistering days you get on the plains. The sun was like a flaming sword, and the wind that came over the bleached plain cut the skin open. There was no water to drink. The men's swollen tongues were hanging out of their mouths, and their carbines were so hot that they blistered the flesh on their hands. And all the while Will was swearing and swearing, and trying to get the devils to fight him. There was no fight in them. They had a sure thing of it waiting."

"In the afternoon it got so terrible that the men could not breathe. They began to faint under the torturing sun. Will wanted some one to come out and ride into camp for a cavalry troop. Joe was lying in the shade of a supply wagon, and he got up and led his pony over. The Indians were lying off about three miles then waiting for night, when they could come in and make things lively again with showers of rifle balls."

"This was all down in Arizona. Never been in Arizona, eh? Well, it was a nice country in those days. Your scalp was worth just about ten cents, par value. A friend of mine, Will Savrin, was a lieutenant in the —th. He picked up a half-breed, the meanest looking half breed I ever saw. The whites of his eyes showed every time you spoke to him. I wouldn't have trusted him if my neck had been in danger and he could have saved it. Will found some of the soldiers kicking and cuffing the half-breed around camp one day. The Indian was just whining and taking it all. Will cursed the men on the spot and threw two or three of them over their heels. He took the half-breed, warned him up and gave him something to eat. He couldn't drive the worthless devil away then, and so made a kind of man-servant of him, naming him Joe. But the Indian wasn't worth a rap for any kind of work."

"The redskins chased the half breed Joe for nine hours. They shot him, too, but the boy took off a sash which he wore and tied himself to his pony's neck when he got so weak that he could hold on no longer. And that's the way the pony carried the boy into camp in a dead faint. There was no need to tell them what the trouble was. It was after midnight then, but in twenty minutes a cavalry troop was galloping northward. The next forenoon the men in the train could see their sabers flashing in the sunlight miles away. They came over the plain with the sound of light thunder, and the first cries the relief heard from the train were cheers that came from the burning throats and shriveled lips for the half-breed Joe."

"The cavalry brushed the redskins off the plain and sent them scurrying in the direction that the sun went. They pulled Joe together and got him on his feet again, but after he got well he was the same lazy, good-for-nothing half-breed that he was before—absolutely fit for nothing. And yet, don't you know, I really believe in spite of myself that I think better of all half-breeds on account of that boy."

"Gentlemen, will you drink to the half-breed Joe?"

To Save Sutter's Fort.

We clip the following from the Wilkes-barre (Pa.) Record, November 30. R. H. McKune, therein mentioned, is a cousin of J. H. McKune of this city, who came to this State (then territory) in 1849, followed mining for about three years, and then returned to his old home in Scranton, Pa. He was mayor of that city during the excitement in that state caused by the Molly Maguire secret society. As mayor he was called on to antagonize that organization, and was seriously injured by them, but escaped with his life: "The old Californians having purchased the land for $40,000 upon which stood Sutter's Fort, are now engaged in restoring the old familiar landmark to its former appearance and condition, including the outer walls and bastions, which will hereafter be preserved for all time to come in memory of that old pioneer and philanthropist, General John A. Sutter. They are now asking for a popular subscription of $1 from the old Californians on the Atlantic slope. Any such in this vicinity may subscribe through Robert H. McKune, who will forward their subscriptions to the New York treasurer of the Associated Pioneers of the Territorial Days of California."

The Reaper, Death.

The harvest of death still continues. Geo. W. Newbert, for many years county jailer, and a prominent citizen, died on Tuesday. He leaves a family.

William Daley, an old-time resident of Folsom, passed away last Monday.

Miss Stella Phillips, one of the most popular and accomplished young ladies of this city, yielded to the unrelenting power of death on Tuesday. Her sudden and untimely demise was a surprise to her hosts of friends and admirers.

Frank Graham, of Elk Grove, died Tuesday, after a brief illness. He was a Native Son and prominent Odd Fellow. He leaves a widow and two children.

John Oswald, a pioneer, is also numbered with the silent majority.

Mark Twain likes to play practical jokes, or rather likes to try to play them, for he is rarely, if ever, successful in his efforts in this direction, says a writer in the Boston Globe. "A friend writes me from Aix les Bains that while Mark was there this summer the noted humorist met with a singular discomfiture at the hands of an Englishman. One night the Englishman met Mark in a hallway of the hotel, where both were staying, and borrowed a match to light the lamp in his room. In a spirit of fun Mark gave him a safety match, which, as you know, is lit by being struck on the rough side of the box. As Mark went to his own room he chuckled; in his mind's eye he saw the Briton scrubbing the wall with the match in a vain endeavor to light it, and then going down stairs for a fresh match. By and by Mark went out into the corridor, hoping to meet the Briton, in order to give him another 'safety.' But the Briton did not come down. At dinner next day Mark innocently inquired of the Briton if the match was all right. 'Oh, yes,' was the reply, 'it wouldn't light on my trousers, so I struck it on the window pane. Those safety matches can be ignited on glass, don't you know.' Mark knows now, if he didn't know before, for he has tried it, and found that the Briton's statement was correct."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Mr. Potter of Texas, Gunter's dramatization of his novel of that title, is a splendid characterization. It is modern every-day life, and particularly the Texan, is a Texan in the true sense of the word. Miss Jeffreys Lewis has a strong part in "Lady Annerly," and the old spirit which dominated in "Zec-ka" and "Stephanie" appears in this drama. We are glad that this great actress has returned to her place at the head of dramatic artists. The divine fires seemed to be smothered for a time, but are rekindled, and this great favorite retains her place in the front ranks of dramatic art. The cast is a strong one, including Joseph Wheelock, Frank E. Aiken, Maurice Drew, M. B. Snyder, Edgar Norton, Franz Rineau, Thomas Jackson, Cecil Kingston, May Harris, Lee Lemar, Josie Langley and others. On Thursday night Mr. Potter of Texas will be given at the Metropolitan, with the above cast.

Curious Superstitions.

The people of the West Indies are the most superstitious in the world. To them everything out of the ordinary is a "sign." In Cuba a person with a sore or wound of any kind will not look upon a dead person, fearing that the spot will become incurable and never heal. The rum used in washing a dead body is, however, regarded as a sure cure for all eye troubles. They also believe that if the light from a candle or lamp falls on the face of the dead that death will shortly come to him or her who was carrying the light. Rain during a burial is considered an excellent "sign" throughout the islands. If one measures his own height with a rod which has been used in measuring a corpse for the coffin, he himself will die within the year. A stroke with the hand of a corpse is believed by the West Indian to be a sure cure for all pains and swellings. The lilac or "hay-brush" is a common charm against all evil spirits and is, on that account, usually planted at doorways or under windows. In Barbadoes the ground dove sitting on a house is a sign that some member of the family there residing will die before the birds nest again. A procession of black ants is said to be a presage of a funeral in all but one or two of the West Indies. In St. Croix a small bird locally called "creeper" is thought to be the forerunner of illness or trouble. In St. Vincent the upsetting of a calabash in a boat is equivalent to inviting the fury of the elements. To open an umbrella in a house also brings bad luck; so, too, does the presentation of a pair of scissors, unless a crooked pin is also included in the gift.

Water as a Medicine.

The human body is constantly undergoing tissue change. Worn-out particles are cast aside and eliminated from the system, while the new are ever being formed, from the inception of life to its close. Water has the power of increasing these tissue changes, which multiply the waste products, but at the same time they are renewed by its agency, giving rise to increased appetite, which in turn provides fresh nutriment. Persons but little accustomed to drink water are liable to have the waste products formed faster than they are removed. Any obstruction to the free working of natural laws at once produces disease, which, if once firmly seated, requires both time and money to cure. People accustomed to rise in the morning weak and languid will find the cause in the imperfect secretion of wastes, which many times may be remedied by drinking a full tumbler of water before retiring. This very materially assists in the process during the night and leaves the tissues fresh and strong, ready for the active work of the day. Hot water is one of our best remedial agents. A hot bath on going to bed, even in the hot nights of summer, is a better reliever of insomnia than many drugs. Inflated parts will subside under the continued poulticing of real hot water. Very hot water, as we all know, is a prompt checker of bleeding, and besides, if it is clean, as it should be, it aids in sterilizing our wound. A riotous stomach will nearly always gratefully receive a glass or more of hot water.

For Insomnia Sufferers.

The Delsartian doctrine of rest by voluntary muscular relaxation is somewhat confirmed by the experience of those who have acted upon this theory in overcoming insomnia. Nothing so quickly brings sleep as the voluntary disposal of the body and limbs in such fashion as to promote muscular relaxation. The legs and arms should be so placed as to bring them in contact with the mattress at as many points as possible. This affords support and relieves the muscles. The body should be disposed in like fashion, and if all has been done properly the wooer of sleep will presently have the consciousness of resting with his whole weight directly upon the mattress. When once this feeling comes sleep usually follows. The plan is far better than the old one of repeating the numerals or going over some meaningless series of words, for it has the double advantage of putting the physical man into an attitude of repose and of distracting the mind from whatever thoughts are at enmity with sleep.

The height of a person with a "perfect figure" should be exactly equal to the distance between the tips of the middle fingers of either hand, when the arms are fully extended.

Ten times the length of the hand, or seven and a half times the length of the foot, or five times the diameter of the chest, from one armpit to the other, should also give the height of the whole body.

The distance from the junction of the thighs to the ground should be exactly the same as from that point to the crown of the head. The knee should be exactly midway between the first-named point and the ground at the heel.

The distance from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger should be the same as from the elbow to the middle line of the breast.

From the top of the head to the level of the chin should be the same as from the level of the chin to that of the armpits, and from the heel to the toe.

Mutual Recrimination.

She—"I thought I married the best man in town, but I find I made a mistake."

He—"I thought I married the best little girl in town, and I find that I was not mistaken."

She—"Forgive me, Charlie; you know that I don't always mean what I say."

He (sotto voice)—"Neither do I."

A very mean man. He undertakes to supply his office boy with dinner, but just before that meal he makes the poor lad stick down about a couple of hundred envelopes. The taste of the gum takes the edge off his appetite.

A colored philosopher is reported to have said: "Life, my breddern, am mos'ly made up of prayin' for rain, and then wishin' it would cl'ar off."

Some Queer Superstitions.

"The blood of a white hen smeared all over the face that is full of freckles, and let alone until it be dry, and then wiped off clean, taketh away the freckles and spots."

"An excellent cure for the gout is to take a young puppy, all of one color, if you can get such a one, and cut him in two pieces through the back while alive, and lay the hot end to the grieved place."

"The hoofs and fore feet of a cow, dried and taken any way, are excellent against a cough. If burnt, the smoke of them will drive away mice."

"If your nose bleed on the left side, crush the little finger of the right hand; and for the other side, do the opposite."

"An egg that is laid on Thursday, the white being emptied out and the empty place being filled with salt and gently roasted by the fire, will cure cankered teeth and kill the worms which eat the teeth."

"Cantharides wrapped in a spider's web and hanged over him who is suffering with quartane ague perfectly cures him."

"To draw a tooth without pain: Fill an earthen crucible with emmets, or ants, eggs and all, and when you have burned them, keep the ashes, with which, if you touch a tooth, it will drop out."

"The little bone of the knee joint of a hare's hind leg doth presently help the cramps, if you do but touch the grieved place with it."

"Take a great, overgrown toad and tie her up in a leather bag pricked full of holes, and put bag and all in an ant hill. The ants will eat away all her flesh; then you can find a stone of marvelous virtue. If a man be poisoned, this stone will draw all the poison to it presently; if he be stung or bitten by an adder, by touching it with this stone, both pain and swelling will presently cease."

"Jet, as well as amber, if hung about one's neck, is profitable against the distillation of phlegm in the throat and lungs."

"If a man hath the dropsy, stand him up to his neck in sand by the seaside on a hot day and the sand will draw up all the water and cure the disease."

"A stone called granite, if worn in a bag at the neck, strengthens the heart, but is said to hurt the brain."

'Rah Stanford!

The action of the students of the university in adopting a modification of the U. C. yell is to be commended.

There were a number who desired to adopt a yell like that of Harvard and Yale; but why go east for a model when there is a good one here? The fact that it may be mistaken for the Berkeley cry cuts no figure in the case. The object of a yell, as we understand it, is to give to the freshman's throat the indurated condition necessary to enable him to withstand the eroding tendency of his favorite beverage. As peculiarly adapted to this purpose, we would suggest the following: "Yi, yi, yi, toona muck-a-li, ninety-five, ninety-five; we are fly!" There is no copyright upon this yell, and it would have the advantage of being original.

The objection to purple and gold as the college colors is as futile as the objection to the yell. Purple is the emblem of royalty, and gold is the color of the lining of a student's pocket—during the first year. It would show a craven spirit to allow Berkeley the monopoly of such a desirable combination. As well permit them to obliterate the freshman's trademark from the big tank in front of Faculty Row.

The relative strength of the classes this year seems to make the senior's extremity the freshman's opportunity, and we would not blame the last-named class for establishing its own colors as those of the university. We had supposed the freshman's choice to be a brilliant crimson, but some of the development of recent "exams" incline us to the opinion that "vert" would be more appropriate, though, if a certain deputy sheriff of our acquaintance had his way, the emblem would present a rare and striking combination of black and blue.

Whatever the choice may be, here's to its success in every contest. 'Rah!—Weekly Palo Alto.

"A Grind," writing in the current number of the North American Review, says that "the poor man at Harvard is not only snubbed by his more fortunate fellow-students, but finds himself more or less an outcast." That is a statement that should be accepted with reservation. The position of a poor man at college is like that of a poor man in later life—just what he has the ability to make it. If he is a companionable fellow, with a disposition to excel in the pursuits that interest college men, whether scholarship or athletics, he does not lack for friends or sympathy, for the college boy, more than any other, is eager to make open acknowledgment of his appreciation of merit. But if the poor man secludes himself in his quarters, lets his hair grow long and the dandruff show on his coat collar, and becomes "a grind" in verity, he may some day after graduation burst forth into a butterfly splendor, but it is not the fault of his fellows that they recognize in him only the grub—the burrowing and unsocial grind.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—TAKE Notice.—That on the 4th day of December, 1891, at the opening of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, in Department One thereof, or as soon thereafter as the matter can be reached, I will apply to said Court to enter an order adjudging me to be a sole trader, and granting me all the privileges and immunities of a sole trader as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, Sections 1811 to 1821, inclusive. The nature of the business to be conducted by me is keeping a dairy and selling milk; the place of my said business is Sacramento County, Sutter Township, and the name of my husband is J. L. Clark.

KATIE E. CLARK.

He is No Fighter.

The flesh of young giraffes, and of fat cows especially, is excellent. There is the least musky flavor, perhaps, but it is not unpleasant. The tongue and marrow bones are great delicacies, the latter particularly furnishing the rarest and most delicious banquet of the African hunter.

Few beasts of the chase are more poorly endowed with means of defense; but even the mild giraffe, when wounded and brought to a stand, will, if the hunter approaches from the front, chop at him with its fore feet; and a blow from such a limb is an exceedingly dangerous one. I have questioned many hunters on this point, and cannot ascertain that the giraffe uses its legs in any other system of defense.

At the present time the giraffe is mainly sought after for the value of its hide, which, even so far up country as Khama's Town, Palachewe, now commands a value of from £2 10s to £4 10s a skin, varying according to age and sex. The hide of a tough, thick-skinned old bull, from an inch to an inch and a quarter in thickness, is, of course, the most sought after. When one of these great creatures lies prone upon the veldt, it seems as if enveloped in a mantle of brass, and the fingers can make no impression whatever upon the carcass. Not many years since the hides of the rhinoceros and hippopotamus furnished ox whips and riding whips—colonially known as sjamboks—all over South Africa. But the rhinoceros is all but exterminated south of the Zambesi; the hippopotamus becomes scarcer year by year, and the hide of the giraffe is consequently in greatly increased demand.

A few years back there happened a dearth of sjambok hide, the price of whips rose immensely, and a giraffe skin sold readily for £5, and more. Forthwith parties of Dutch and native hunters flocked into the Kalahari, and scores upon scores of giraffes were slaughtered. On coming out with their loads the hunters discovered that they had overstocked the market and that prices had rapidly fallen again. Most up-country natives, especially the Bechuanaas, use the hide of the giraffe for making the neat sandals they habitually wear, preferring it for its strength and toughness to any other. It seems a pity that for the sake only of whips and sandals and to furnish the hunter with meat and an exciting form of sport, this stately creature should be exterminated from South Central Africa, as it bids fair to soon be.

Proverbs.

The Turks have proverbs without number; and very polished and cynical Turkish proverbs are. The taciturn Arabs prefer proverbs to every other form of speech, and use them with singular dignity and aptness. The Koran seems to have been enriched with them for the express purpose of quotation. The Chinese are very prone to cruel little cold-blooded proverbs, as oblique as their eyes, but full of grim sagacity. The Japanese rejoice in flowery maxims combining wisdom with humor, and often with a touch of pathos that makes them cling in the memory long after the rest of the discourse is forgotten. Even the Coreans, shamefaced mutes as they are, indulge in a few shy proverbs. The Polynesians, with their babel of tongues and dialects, have a myriad of proverbs, many of them highly picturesque and striking. The Maoris of New Zealand, the finest savages in the world, cannot carry on a discussion for five minutes without resorting to proverbs. So profound is the respect for proverbs, as for everything ancient or obscure, among the Maoris, that a wily and ready orator, failing to carry his audience by mere reason, will sometimes—but not too often—help himself out with an admirable proverb invented on the spur of the moment, but fathered on some demigod of awful sanctity or some war chief of gloriously cannibal memory. Such an appeal is seldom unsuccessful, even though the audience have a shrewd suspicion that the proverb which has pleased and impressed them so much is neither so old nor so genuine as it might be. The degraded tribes that yet linger on the outskirts of civilization in Australia, and whose past is a bewildering mystery not less to the student of language than to the student of man, use proverbial expressions which make one stare in wonder. Whence have these brutish creatures descended, that they also should have the wisdom of the ancients on the tip of their tongue? These black fellows' proverbs seem a distinct echo of some far higher intelligence, and, in truth, they harmonize with many startling traces of lost religions and forgotten arts that here and there are still found among them.—The Nineteenth Century.

Work of a Cherry Tree.

A cherry tree in a colony of negroes near Lake Contrary, Mo., bloomed recently, and an old colored woman who is credited with supernatural powers declared that it was an omen of the approaching end of the world. The colony became excited, held religious services and waited for the end. But two weeks passed and the excitement began to subside. Then several trees bloomed, and all the negroes in the colony packed their household goods and left the place.

Month Stones.

He who in January to this world came Shall for his month stone a garnet claim;
 And he who in February first saw the light
 Shall wear on his finger an amethyst bright;
 And he who was born in March must take
 The bloodstone for his birth month's sake.
 Happy the maid who in April was born,
 For a beautiful diamond her hand shall adorn;
 And the lovely emerald, so the books say,
 Shall the person wear who was born in May;
 And he who in June came to this earth
 Shall an agate wear for the month of his birth;

And he a ruby must supply
 Who came to this world in the month of July;

And the person who in August came
 Must wear the stone sardonyx by name;
 And he who was born in breezy September
 Shall wear the sapphire, please remember;
 And the opal, of misfortune and hope the stone,

October's child will have to own;
 And the beautiful topaz shall be worn
 By the person who in November was born;
 And he who came in December cold
 Shall wear the turquoise in a circle of gold.

Born and Dead on Same Day.

Several of the world's most noted characters have died on the anniversary of their birthday. The Talmud says: "Moses died on the seventh day of Adar, the same day of the same month on which he was born, his age being exactly 120 years."

Shakespeare, the "Sweet Bard of Avon," was born April 23, 1564; died April 23, 1616.

Raphael Sengio d'Urbino, the great artist, was born on Good Friday, 1483; died on Good Friday, 1520, aged 37. Good Friday is a movable feast, so the day of the month may not have been the same, but I have the high authority of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" for the assertion that "he died aged exactly 37."

Sir Thomas Browne, author of "Religio Medici," was born October 19, 1605; died October 19, 1682. Timothy Swan, composer, was born July 23, 1758; died July 23, 1842. General McLean Taylor, a nephew of President Taylor, was born November 21, 1828; died November 21, 1875. St. John of God, one of the most eminent of the Portuguese saints, was born March 8, 1495; died March 8, 1550. He was the founder of the order of charity.

John Sobieski, the king of Poland who delivered Vienna from the Turks, was born June 17, 1629; died June 17, 1696.

Perhaps there are others equally as prominent in the world's history who have had the same remarkable coincidences, but these are all I have been able to find record of up to the present time.

A shrewd observer of large experience remarks that society is not everywhere as bad as we are given to understand. Those who have the entree of its charmed circle are not all decollette in modes and morals. In the times of the Roses in England virtue was a laughing-stock, marriage was a farce; all bonds were loosened in social life. The cavalier was a rake, and his fair ladye no better than she ought to be. Rivers of blood were shed for a woman's glove. Bull-baiting and cock-fighting were aristocratic pleasures. Bishops and dignitaries sat down together at the gaming table. A man was not reckoned a gentleman unless he was carried to his bed from beneath the table of the banquet hall. We have made a great advance upon those times. Snobs and dandies and frivolous young women are not now the truest expression of our social life.

Genius is a gift of God, a native endowment of the few; but these few need training in order that their genius may not be ill-used or wasted, but employed at its best for the welfare of man. How can our great men be trained except in great institutions of learning, where it may be possible to climb to the highest reaches of human thought, and undergo that patient, persistent, comprehensive and exact discipline that will enable them to accomplish the greatest work of human skill?

There is always happiness in the thought of Christmas. Even the poorest people find an enjoyment in the approach of this great holiday, unless sickness or death visit their firesides. For the greatest joy we can always look beneath the roofs of the poorer classes, there the substantial trifles bestowed upon the little ones are more valued than the costly gifts of pampered wealth. It is contentment that brings true happiness. We often think that it would be much better to avoid the glitter and show of wealth in the bestowal of gifts, in order to avert the possibility of envy in the less favored. It is envy that detracts from proper enjoyment of these great festivals. The source of happiness is to look on the bright side of life. On such occasions as Christmas tide particularly this spirit should prevail. This is a time for the wealthy to evince that true charity which produces joyous hearts and good will toward all mankind. Let their distributions go to the needy, then the true objects of the celebration of the birth of the "meek and lowly" will be attained. It is not the costly presents and lavish feasts that brings happiness, but the equalized good cheer for rich and poor. The day is not a license for excesses or extremes, but to remind us of "peace on earth and good will toward man." It is to be regretted that many look upon this day in a commercial sense, and expect, often, more than they get, thus creating sourness and disappointment. This idea of its observance make those of moderate means dread its recurrence, because they are unable to comply with the demands that fall upon them in the way of presents. As said by a writer on the subject, "It began to take on the aspect of a great lottery, in which one class expected to draw in reverse proportion to what it put in, and another class knew that it would reap as it had sowed." The day never was intended as an opportunity to pay social debts.

The government of Chile evinces a contemptuous disregard of the demands of the United States. It is said that this is not the expression of the people, and that whatever animosity exists is on the part of the officials. Our nation has exercised much forbearance toward our neighbor, but there is a limit to patience and good nature. It is best always to avoid extremes if there is a possibility, but Chile has thus far taken advantage of the forbearing nature of Uncle Sam. There is no other nation that would have submitted to the affronts offered by Chile to this country. The time has evidently arrived for decisive action, and Chile must be taught a lesson of respect to the American flag. It may be an expensive undertaking, yet the dignity of the American nation demands that Chile shall be punished. The successes of Chile have made her arrogant, and possibly she believes herself able to cope with the United States. She must be taught a salutary lesson as an example to other countries who presume upon our good nature.

The decision of the supreme court declaring the grand jury of San Francisco an illegal body was but expressive of the principles of Americanism. It has no relation to the question of the guilt or innocence of the parties who had been or who might have been indicted by that body; it was simply a rebuke to the assumption by a judge of dictatorial power. In the case of Judge Wallace, he assumed practically to select a grand jury, and later on did assume to select a trial jury. It is manifest that under such circumstances there would have resulted practically the giving to one man despotic power. Our system of government is wisely framed. Three independent branches do exist, each with independent functions, and each a restraint upon the others. The judicial department might be said to be the balancing wheel. There should be exercised the calmest deliberation; there passion should not be an element of swayment. The situation of matters in San Francisco furnish less justification for the course of Judge Wallace than that which does exist in the other counties. There the jury lists are made out by the twelve superior judges; in the other counties the selections are made by the members of the Boards of Supervisors. In the first place, Judge Wallace was one of the twelve men primarily responsible for the selection of the names of the 144 persons that were placed in the general grand jury box. He did order that 25 names be drawn, an unusually small number, from which it was expected to impanel a grand jury of 19. As it was, but 18 of the 25 appeared, and of those who did appear 8 were excused. There did remain in the grand jury box over 100 names that had been selected by the superior judges, but it would seem Judge Wallace lacked confidence in the selections that had been made by his associates, and directed that a special venire issue. In cases of selection of jurors on a special venire the sheriff acts, unless for specific reason he is disqualified; in that event the coroner acts. Judge Wallace, by inference, assumed that both those executive officers could not be trusted, and did himself name an elisor to select the jurors. It was upon that point that the controversy arose as to the legality of the grand jury, and manifestly the decision of the supreme court is right. If it should be permitted that a judge, who is not a whit better than the other officers whom the people select, can assume the powers of two branches of government, there will be a return to despotism. Later on Judge Wallace appointed an elisor to select trial jurors, before whom, with himself as judge, it was proposed the persons indicted by the grand jury should be tried. It is evident that under those circumstances a man, be he guilty or innocent, would be inevitably convicted. There has perhaps not been in this day a parallel to this highhanded attempt at usurpation of power, and while the social situation in San Francisco may be such that of twelve superior judges but one is perfect, and that executive officers chosen by the people cannot be trusted, we are inclined to believe the rebuke of the supreme court is well merited. It does strike us Judge Wallace was in large measure playing to the gallery; perhaps we have not the confidence he has in the modern press. There is something of excuse that a casual reader may permit himself to be inflamed by reading newspaper articles; he is not presumed to consider the fact that in this day most newspapers are insincere, and that while it does appear they are the special guardians of the people, the people is the bird they seek to pluck. This decision will have a salutary effect; it will teach such men as Judge Wallace that the day of Jeffrey has passed, and that with this people there is no disposition to open the door for the introduction of Russian injustice.

We are gratified that public attention is being directed by the press to the fact that there is much that is of little practical value taught in the public schools, and that there should be a judicious elimination in the course of study. The end to be attained by popular education is to so train the pupils that they will be prepared to assume the duties and the responsibilities that will be cast upon them when they enter practical life. It may be an unjust criticism upon the text-books of to-day to say that they do not compare with those of years ago; and it would almost seem it was the design of the compilers to make them as intricate as possible. In this state, in 1884, a constitutional amendment was passed providing for the compilation and publication of text-books for the schools. The appropriations that have been made to carry out the will of the people have been munificent, and yet the work is not completed. We feel justified in pronouncing a severe criticism against the work of those who had charge of the compilation of the text-books; and it does seem there has been almost a systematic plan to cripple the public text-book system. It does seem to us that educated men well paid for their services could within a reasonable time compile a series of text-books that would be an improvement upon those issued by private publishers. Of the merits or demerits of a school-book, men not educators can judge, and we believe if the governor would take the trouble to make a careful investigation of this matter it would result in much benefit. It is no secret that the system has encountered, and that it will encounter, the opposition of private publishers. For that reason, if for no other, the executive should be vigilant and should not hesitate to insist that the people should have that which they have demanded, and the very best article for their money.

The census returns show the following statistics regarding the California institution for deaf, dumb and blind, at Berkeley. The asylum was established in 1860. From 1860 to 1869 the total inmates thereof was 526, of which 348 were males and 178 females. From 1870 to 1879 the total was 786, including 478 males and 308 females. From 1880 to 1889 the total was 1,294, being 798 males and 496 females. The expenses of this institution for the first decade was $204,828; for the second decade, from 1870 to 1880, the outlay was $362,195; for the period between 1880 and 1889 the expenses were $499,311. These expenditures include buildings.

A distinguished man has fallen beneath the sickle of death. Hon. George G. Blanchard died at his home in Placerville, El Dorado county, last Sunday, after a very brief illness. He was a part of this state. For many years he has been one of the leading spirits in politics, and has been identified in some of the most important legal contests as a member of the bar. No man possessed more emphatic and decided opinions on all questions of politics or public interests. He was a leader by reason of his great natural endowments. A warm and devoted friend, and a generous enemy. Fearless and outspoken in matters of public import, indefatigable in defense of the interests and cause of his client. There was no element of selfishness in his nature, and it was only through the purest motives he could be induced to aspire to political preferment. His ambition seemed to rest in the welfare of his friends rather than to seek public office. Many men owe to him their advancement to high public stations. His warm, jovial, generous impulses always made him a general favorite at the bar, and in all the political party conventions of the state. No republican state convention was complete without the presence of Hon. Geo. G. Blanchard. While advanced in years, he seemed to have a long lease of life remaining. His robust form and lively manners bore him well for many years more of life. At the time of his sudden demise he was counsel in some of the great litigation of the state. It will always be a calamity to lose such great moving spirits from our midst. We have known Hon. Geo. G. Blanchard from our earliest boyhood, and can truthfully say that his history forms many chapters in the history of this state; particularly is this true with regard to the history of the bar. He was a powerful advocate before a jury, and a great reasoner with the courts. Many interesting reminiscences could be recalled of this distinguished man, and which in due time it will be our purpose to present to the reading public. The greatest praise that can be accorded to our fellow is, that "He is a good man." Geo. G. Blanchard possessed all the qualities of goodness and greatness.

The dying expressions of men are presumed to, and perhaps do, truly represent their feelings. In law it is a principle that, when one is in extremis he will speak the truth, and the solemnity of his situation takes the place of an oath. Whatever may have been the previously expressed opinions of men, when the ending is imminent there comes an unmasking. Voltaire, the famous French writer, and perhaps the most noted author of atheistic works, died in May, 1778. Of him it is said that when the curtains were about to be parted, and he was about to enter the unknown land, he did say to his daughter, "Believe not that which I have said and written; there is a God." The great Washington, at the supreme moment said, "It is well." There was contentment expressed in the dying words of John Quincy Adams, "This is the last of earth, I am content." The words of Cæsar were of reproach, "And thou too, Brutus." Poor Goldsmith, who wrote the purest English, but who was always in financial straits, was asked by his physicians, "Is your mind at ease?" To the query he did make the mournful reply, "No, it is not." Different it was with Dr. Wm. Hunter, who said, "If I had strength to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die." The wearied brain of Byron did express itself, "I must sleep now." The atheist Hobbes realized his situation as did Voltaire, and exclaimed, "I am taking a fearful leap in the dark." Lord Thurlow regarded the matter with reckless wonder, and said, "I'm shot, if I don't believe I'm dying." The imperious Elizabeth said at the ending, "All my possessions for a moment of time." The deaf Beethoven gladly exclaimed, "I shall hear." To his friends who gathered about his couch, a famous French wit said faintly, "You cannot cry as much for me as I have made you laugh in my time." Bobby Burns, it would seem, gave the critics a parting shot when he at the ending gasped, "Don't let the awkward squad fire over me."

Dinner Table Tricks.

A good dinner table trick is to make an egg force its way into an ordinary wine carafe, such as is found on all well regulated dinner tables. The other accessories are some paper and a medium-hard boiled egg, with the shell taken off. Drop the paper lighted into a wine bottle, and get the interior well heated. This expands the air within and forces part of it out. While the interior is hot, stand the egg up on end in the neck of the bottle, and let it rest there. As the bottle cools off, the egg will begin to force its way in, until it finally drops.

Another trick, which works on the same principle, is to make a banana peel itself. To do this all that is wanted is a wine bottle, a ripe banana and a bit of paper wet with alcohol. Light the paper and drop it into the bottle. When the air in the bottle is well heated, set the banana on end on top and let it do the rest itself, as the air on the inside cools off and contracts, the outside pressure pushing the banana down into the bottle until it has pulled itself out of its skin.

What most characterizes a gentleman is thoughtfulness for others. A true gentleman does not allow himself to annoy any person with whom he is on good terms. He not only refrains from saying or doing anything which he knows is questionable, but he also refrains from anything which others may consider questionable. He places thoughtfulness above self-gratification at home or abroad.

There are men who love only themselves; these are men of hatred: to love one's self alone is to hate others.

The Rock-Tomb of Bradore.

A drear and desolate shore!
Where no tree untolds its leaves,
And never the spring wind weaves
Green grass for the hunter's tread;
A laud forsaken and dead,
Where the ghostly icebergs go
And come with the ebb and flow
Of the waters of Bradore!
A wanderer from a land
By summer breezes fanned
Looked around him, awed, subdued,
By the dreadful solitude,
Hearing alone the cry
Of seabirds clanging by.
The crash and grind of the floe,
Wail of wind and wash of tide,
"O wretched land!" he cried;
"Land of all lands the worst—
God-forsaken and cursed!
Thy gates of rock should show
The words of the Tuscan seer,
Read in the Realm of Woe:
"Hope entereth not here!"
Lo! at his feet there stood,
A block of smooth larch-wood,
Beside a rock-closed cave,
By nature fashioned for a grave,
Safe from the ravening bear
And fierce fowl of the air,
Wherein to rest was laid
A twenty-summers maid,
Whose blood had equal share
Of the lands of vine and snow—
Half French, half Eskimo.
In letters uneffaced
Upon the block were traced
The grief and hope of man.
And thus the legend ran:
"We loved her!
Words can not tell how well
We loved her!
God loved her!
And called her home to peace and rest,
We loved her!"
The stranger paused and read,
"O winter land!" he said,
"Thy right to be I own;
God leaves thee not alone.
And if the fierce winds blow
Over thy wastes of rock and snow,
And at thy iron gates
The ghostly icebergs wait,
Thy homes and hearts are dear;
Thy sorrow o'er thy sacred dust
Is sanctified by hope and trust;
God's love and man's are here.
Still, wheresoe'er it goes
Love makes its atmosphere
Its flowers of Paradise
Take root in the eternal ice,
And bloom thro' Polar snows!"
—John Greenleaf Whittier.

Experience of a Russian Exile in a Siberian Penal Settlement.

"Our worst trouble is want of food," writes a Siberian exile. "However hard we work at our fishing, however careful we are never to lose a chance of obtaining any kind of meat, all the same, in summer there are times when we have to actually starve; for in summer there is absolutely no meat to be got, and to live constantly and exclusively on fish not only affects one with nausea, but with some people produces actual fish-poisoning.

"We have all come to the conclusion that a sudden change from ordinary food to an exclusive fish diet results in a peculiar form of poisoning not yet known to science. In winter, when there is meat as well, we all eat the fish, but in summer the mere sight of boiled fish affects many with nausea and vomiting.

"In summer we live on a very small quantity of flour, a little milk from our own cows, wild berries and the intermediate fish. The worst time of year is the beginning of autumn, when large quantities of food have to be stored up and the roads are not properly frozen.

"The cows leave off giving milk; neither carcasses nor live cattle are brought in. The only way out of the difficulty would be to go to sleep for three weeks, like the bears. But even at the best season of the year we never have really enough to eat; we are too poor for that. And even if we were rich it would not help us; there is not enough food in the place. You can imagine how delightful it must be to lie down hungry at night, to wake up the next morning still hungrier, to wait anxiously for the half-rations that go by the name of dinner; after dinner to go into the kitchen and carefully gather up all the bits—all scrapings of pots and pans; then to strap one's belt tight for hunger and wait for supper; * * * and so on, day after day. It is like the life of half-starved sailors wrecked on a desert island.

"All our life is made up of a thousand pitiable wants and hardships. Altogether, our housekeeping is very original—on the one hand, an out-of-the-way Arctic hole where we are nobody's business and nobody cares what we do or how we manage; on the other, our stern jailer, Nature, who forces us to live quite in prison style, to sleep in general barracks, to eat at a general mess, and so on.

"If we did not submit to this we should all have died of cold and hunger before now. Another feature of our life is the hard manual labor—labor as of a beast of burden—such as even the all-enduring Russian peasant has no idea of. For instance, for two persons to drag a loaded barge along with towing ropes for forty miles is regarded here as the merest trifle, and as there are no sails here, hauling and rowing are the only means of navigation.

"Then there is the autumn fishing, standing knee-deep in the water and floating ice and pulling at a frozen rope, that cuts your hands till the blood comes; then mowing in the deep swamp mud at the mercy of the mosquito, often without any food or any drink but the water from the bog pools; then again the hewing of trees in winter, and in summer the towing of rafts forty miles or more, and so on indefinitely."

Old Managers.

In a recent installment of Col. Brown's "History of the Theater in America" there appeared this interesting paragraph: "It has long been a mooted question as to who is the oldest living manager at present engaged in management. There are but two gentlemen to whom belong that credit—James H. McVicker and John T. Ford. Mr. McVicker first became a manager (on a salary) in 1851, and became a salary-paying manager November 5, 1857. He is still a manager, having been so for forty years. John T. Ford commenced as manager in 1851 (in minstrels). He took the Holiday-street theater, Baltimore, for that use and leased it in August of that year for dramatic purposes. He continued there twenty years. John Ellsler commenced as manager early in 1850, in partnership with Joseph Jefferson, having a southern circuit embracing Charleston, Savannah, Macon, Augusta, Columbia, Wilmington, N. C., etc. Mr. Ellsler is not now in management, having quit in 1888." To this it may be added that records verify the dates above set down by Col. Brown. But the colonel has not included among the veterans that still gay old minstrel manager and performer, Sam S. Sanford, who is moved by the oversight, to write something after this strain: "As my name isn't mentioned, I presume I'm 'out of sight.' Not so. I am performing to the capacity of all the halls we can find; and as the gentlemen mentioned are all friends of mine, and all knew me as a manager prior to their assuming such positions, they will credit me as the older manager and performer. Yes, I can claim to be the oldest living manager and performer in this country, and I am now performing nightly; and old age, I don't know the meaning of, for I am the same Sam S. Sanford." This is all right so far as it goes, but the veteran Sanford fails to clinch his argument with the light-shedding dates. "Figures talk best after all," says the Clipper. "Mr. Sanford's assertion needs corroborative evidence; and if he will produce the documents or the records to confirm his claim, then a long-mooted question will be no longer mooted. Our records tend to prove that Mr. Sanford is nearly seventy-two, having been born January 1, 1821. He went into the minstrel business in 2840 (having previously been a comic singer), and on August 1, 1853 (or two years later than the year in which Messrs. Ford and McVicker became managers) Mr. Sanford opened the hall known as Korponay's, at Twelfth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia. This was the veteran Sam's first managerial venture, according to our own data, and we think he furnished them to us many years ago. It will be conceded, however, that he enjoys the distinction of being the oldest performing manager now before the public."

Lincoln's First Dollar.

One evening in the executive chamber there were present a number of gentlemen, among them Mr. Seward. A point in the conversation suggesting the thought, Mr. Lincoln said: "Seward, you never heard, did you, how I earned my first dollar?"

"No," said Seward.

"Well," said he, "I was about 18 years of age—belonged, you know, to what they call down south the 'scrub.' People who did not own land or slaves were nobody there. But we had succeeded in raising, chiefly by my labor, sufficient produce, as I thought, to justify me in taking it down the river to sell.

"After much persuasion I got the consent of my mother to go, and constructed a flatboat large enough to take a barrel or two of things that we gathered, with myself and a little bundle, down to New Orleans. A steamboat was coming down the river. We have, you know, no wharves along the western streams, and the custom was, if passengers were at any of the landings, for them to go out in a boat, the steamer stopping and taking them on board.

"I was contemplating my new flatboat and wondering whether I could make it stronger or improve it in any particular, when two men came down to the shore in carriages, with trunks, and, looking at the different boats, singled mine, and asked: 'Who owns this?' I answered somewhat modestly: 'I do.' 'Will you take us and our trunks out to the steamboat?' said one of them. 'Certainly,' said I. I was glad to have the opportunity to earn something.

"I supposed they would give two or three bits. The trunks were put on my flatboat, the passengers sat down themselves on the trunks, and I pushed them out to the steamboat. They got on board and I lifted up their trunks and put them on the deck.

"The steamboat was about to put on steam again when I called out that they had forgotten to pay me. Each took from his pocket a silver half dollar and threw it on the floor of my boat. I could scarcely believe my eyes as I picked up my money.

"Gentlemen, you may think it a very little thing, and in these days it seems to me a trifle, but it was the most important occurrence in my life. I could scarcely credit that I, a poor boy, had earned one dollar in less than a day, and by honest work. The world seemed wider and fairer before me. I was a more hopeful and confident being from that time."

The crescent has been known since time out of memory. In ancient mythology it decorated the foreheads of Diana and of Astarte, the Syrian Venice. In the days of Rome's greatest glory the ladies wore it as an ornament in their hair. Since the foundation of Constantinople (the ancient Byzantium) it has been the emblem of the city, and as such adorns its walls and public buildings, besides being stamped on its coins and postage. The legend which accounts for its universal adoption in Turkey, and Constantinople in particular, is as follows: Philip of Macedon laid siege to the city in the year 340 B. C. He chose a night of unusual darkness for the proposed assault, but was foiled by the moon suddenly breaking from behind a cloud. In commemoration of this providential deliverance the crescent was adopted as the symbol of the city. The Mohammedan sultans were slow to assume this emblem until some one mentioned that it was the symbol of increasing greatness, power changing as rapidly as the phases of the moon.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The portrait painter should be a good theatrical attraction, as he can draw the people.

Frank Daniels has a new play, The Attorney, and will also try The Dead Shot for a curtain-raiser.

A theatrical company may start out with only one walking gentleman, but that doesn't signify the number it will bring back.

Pauline Hall, Lotta and Lillian Russell have no hesitation in saying—and they say it boldly—that they do not contemplate marriage.

One was a prim madonna,
Whose hopes lay far beyond the skies;
The other was a prima donna,
Whose hopes all centered round the flies.

Saidso—When Joblots made his debut as a star the audience went wild; the encore was terrific. Herdso—In what scene was it? Saidso—The one in which he was beheaded.

The versatile young Emperor of Germany has been editing a drama. The next step to take is for him to order the attendance of the public at its performance, under pain of instant death.

A real live aristocrat, the Hon. Vane-Tempest, brother to Lord Londonderry, has been engaged to play "Weedon Grossmith's" part in Pantomime Rehearsal at Toole's, in London.

The Minneapolis Tribune has the following notice of Larry Marston: "Dramatic critics along the route of the Lillian Lewis visitation are hereby warned that Larry Marston has a playful habit of shaking his fist at newspaper men who refuse to stultify themselves by printing flattering notices of his show. But they are also assured that, while Mr. Marston has a valiant voice, he never hurts anybody."

Florence, the actor, once gave some advice to a friend in these words: "My dear —: One gallon of whisky costs about $3 and contains about sixty-five 15-cent drinks. Now, if you must drink, buy a gallon and make your wife the barkeeper. When you are drv give her 15 cents for a drink, and when the whisky is gone she will have, after paying for it, $6 75 left; and every gallon thereafter will yield the same profit. This money she should put away, so that when you have become an inebriate, unable to support yourself, and shunned by every respectable man, your wife may have money enough to keep you until your time comes to fill a drunkard's grave."

George Holland, the veteran actor and teacher, has many reminiscences of the dead comedian Florence, whom he knew well, says the Philadelphia Record. In a reminiscent mood he recalled, recently, several anecdotes of the dead actor which have never been published, and which are new, even to most theatrical people. One was a story of Florence's early career, during an engagement with Macready, in which he played "Catesby." Florence, having a great many entrances and exits to make, was never sure of his cues unless he had his book in his hand. On this occasion he was standing in the wings, when there was a lull on the stage. "I wonder if that's my cue?" thought the young actor. The lull continued, and the cold perspiration broke out on his brow. He determined to take the chances, and, rushing on the stage, exclaimed, "My lord, the Duke of Buckingham is taken!" Macready turned upon him savagely and muttered, in a stage whisper: "Not yet, d—n it! not yet!" "Well," replied Florence in the same tone, "I thought he was," and walked off. Waiting in the wings until the cue finally did come, he stalked in, exclaiming, "My lord, by jingo! we've got him now."

The ability of Henry E. Dixey to entertain off the stage is just as pronounced as when he is behind the footlights. He has a fund of stories, which he knows how to tell, and he has more than one clever specialty to spring upon his companions in drawing-room or cafe. He can split, halve and quarter a full deck of cards by the simple twist of his wrist, but his handcuff trick is about his best. Seated around a table in Hector's restaurant, in Chicago, one night after his performance, the comedian offered to slip any pair of handcuffs that were put on him. There were several newspaper men in the party, including a city editor, who subsequently went with Dixey as his treasurer. He was loud in his offers to bet that he could tie up the comedian, as the entire party drove to the Harrison-street station. The newspaper men brought all their influence to bear on the desk sergeant, who brought out the latest idea in handcuffs. They were a disheartening looking invention, but Dixey put them on and the sergeant locked them. Dixey asked permission to occupy a lone cell for a few moments. The request was granted. When he returned, the "bracelets" were dangling from his little finger. How he did it no one could discover.

Book Chat.

"Mamma," asked little Freddie, "has the Adam's apple of an author got a literary taste?"

To win a wager made with a lady, Sir Edwin Arnold climbed 13,000 feet to the top of Fuji San, in Japan, and wrote on the edge of its crater a picturesque poem of ninety-two lines.

The ups and downs of life can be seen in the career of Frederick Gleason, of Boston. He established the first illustrated paper in this country, and for years Gleason's Pictorial had a large patronage. In 1851 his income was $50,000. Now he is an inmate of the Old Men's Home in Boston.

And now a Shaksperian book-worm comes forward in a lecture at Detroit and declares that Bacon was the fruit of a morganatic marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Earl of Leicester, but was passed off as the son of Lady Nicholas Bacon. So the author of Bacon's works was not Bacon.

Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider, Reading maketh a full man; conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. An oak chair, which thirty-five years ago was made out of the printing press on which the original Kilmar-nock edition of Burns' poems were printed in 1786, has been presented to the Burns cottage at Ayr. There is a model of Burns' bust carved on the back, and below it a carving of "Tam O'Shanter" crossing the "Auld Bridge of Doon." At the centenary dinner at Ayr in 1859 this chair was used by Sir James Ferguson, who presided on the occasion.

It requires nearly 400 large pages to tell what the women said at their national council last winter, and whatever one may think of the suffrage question he cannot read these addresses and reports without coming to the conclusion that there is a big lot of gray matter belonging to the women of this country. If the American women were to decide by popular vote whether or not they would have the ballot they would probably reject it by an overwhelming majority; nevertheless there are a good many women who know better how to vote than not a few of the "lords of creation" who exercise the privilege regularly.

Books make excellent Christmas gifts. The present of a book invariably conveys with it a most soothing and delicate flattery. It is a pretty tribute to the supposed taste of the receiver and to his intellectuality. Even he who is in no sense a reader experiences a comfortable sense of satisfaction in becoming possessed of a volume which either upon his table or from his shelf shall bear false testimony to the possessor's literary taste and discrimination. One can hardly err in turning to books when he finds himself wondering what he should give this friend or that. He must, however, exercise discrimination in the selection of the gift, for in these times there are books by the million and for the million.

Ward McAllister's latest contribution to current literature undertakes to tell what it costs to live in upper tendoms. His figures are rather startling. He tells, for example, that he knows of at least four men in this country who spend annually $400,000. This includes their charities and the interest on the capital stock invested in their town and country houses. Then there are about thirty men who spend from $100,000 to $150,000 a year, though Mr. McAllister tells us these men are really no happier than the man who lives on $35,000, which Mr. McAllister thinks about the right figure to enable a man to maintain his establishment in style and dispense elegant hospitality. As for the average fashionable woman, we are told that she spends from $4,000 to $6,000 a year on her toilet, and generally manages to look handsome.

During the days of Henry Ward Beecher's courtship it is related by his wife that he once dropped into poetry, and wrote a few lines of verse, teeming with affection for his sweetheart. But the verses were always kept sacred by Mrs. Beecher, as they are at the present day, and nothing can win them from her. One day Mr. and Mrs. Beecher were in the office of Robert Bonner, who was then conducting the New York Ledger. "Why don't you write a poem, Beecher?" said the acute publisher. "I will give you more for such a poem than I have for Norwood." "He did once," admitted Mrs. Beecher, and at once Mr. Bonner's eyes sparkled. "Recite it for me, won't you, Mrs. Beecher?" he asked. But the eyes of the great preacher were riveted on his wife, and she knew that meant silence. "Come," said the persistent publisher, "I'll give $5,000 if you will recite that poem for me," addressing Mrs. Beecher. "Why, it ran—," began the preacher's wife. "Eunice," simply said Mr. Beecher. And, although Robert Bonner offered to double the sum first offered, he never got the poem from Mrs. Beecher, and no one has since been a whit more successful.

Professional Chat.

First a tiff and then a plaintiff is the history of many a divorce case.

An Iowa judge let a juror off long enough to get married. After the ceremony the juror went to court again, but not the girl.

The preacher has taken a long step toward the masses who has found out that he can talk for Christ without having on a long-tailed coat.

An attorney observed to a brother in court that he thought whiskers very unprofessional. "You are right," replied his friend; "a lawyer cannot be too barefaced."

A distinguished French physician insists upon it that raw oysters are extremely nourishing, and that in all cases of impaired digestion and nervous troubles they are an excellent tonic.

"I wonder," she said, "why it is that poets are so fond of referring to the vagrant breeze?" "Perhaps," replied the young lawyer, "it is because the breeze has no visible means of support."

One of the prominent preachers of North Dakota is Miss Carrie J. Bartlett, a young woman who stepped from a newspaper office into the pulpit. She is said to be successful in her new field, and is popular with her congregation.

It took Judge Collins, of Chicago, just two hours and twenty-two minutes to try twenty-six divorce cases on Friday last. Judge Collins is evidently determined not to yield the palm to any upstart divorce mills like those in Sioux Falls, S. D., and Galveston, Texas.

"Have you fixed up my will?" said the sick man to his lawyer. "Yes." "Everything as tight as you can make it?" "Entirely so." "Well, now, I want to ask you something—not professionally, but as a plain, every-day man. Who do you honestly think stands the best show for getting the property?"

This story of the Rev. Lyman Beecher, father of Henry Ward Beecher, was told originally by his son: The elder Beecher had been preaching one Sunday at Litchfield, and as he got into the carriage to go home he remarked that he had never preached such a poor sermon before. "Why, father," said Henry, "I never heard you preach louder." "That's it," responded the old man, "when I have nothing to say I always holler."

Strange notions of propriety exist in certain Christian circles in New York, as elsewhere. On a transpency surrounding a lamp on one of the street corners not half way up the city, the announcement is made that services are held every evening, conducted by the Rev. Mr. —, "the tornado evangelist." A wit has suggested that he preach from the text: "A great and strong wind rent the mountains and broke in pieces the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind."

Ex-Senator Edmonds has been living at the Arlington for the past two weeks, and everybody is surprised at the change in his manner. He has been classed with John Sherman as one of the two "icebergs" of the senate. He is now as genial as sunshine. Among his intimate associates Mr. Edmonds was always considered the most charming of men, but to outsiders he has concealed his true self. Now he jokes with the hotel clerks and sits at a table used by transient guests, entering into conversation with those at his table.

As editor of the Times Carter H. Harrison is going to do away with the editorial "we," substituting therefor the bold and unequivocal "I," says the Chicago News. The experiment has been made before, and it has invariably failed. The anonymity of the editorial "we" involves a mysterious power which is always respected, if not feared. Throw off the disguise and mystery which that potent monosyllable affords, and editorial utterance is robbed of half its importance. "I" represents merely an individual opinion; the editorial "we" represents not only the writer and the newspaper, but also the newspaper's constituency, whatever it may be.

Mr. Justice Hawkins, will, on his retirement next month, it is said, resume his old role of advocate. There is no precedent for an English judge appearing again at the bar after retirement, but it is not an uncommon thing for an Indian or colonial judge to resume practice when he has left the bench. These officials, however, are in an entirely different position to their English brethren, and their example counts for very little. The absence of an English precedent is much more to the purpose, and it would probably be considered conclusive by the bar committee if not by the judges before whom the question might be raised. Anyway, it would be decidedly unfair for a judge who had received a handsome pension to enter into competition with his struggling professional brethren who had yet a career to make, to say nothing of the awkwardness of the situation which would be created.

NOTES.

The London Tit Bits says that there is an enterprising physician in California who advertises to pay half the funeral expenses in cases where he is not successful.

The telegraph tells us that lately a terrible and bloody fight took place at a ball given by the colored people in a small Kentucky town; that pistols and knives were freely used and many of the guests killed and others fatally wounded. There is room to doubt the news as not a word is said about razors.

Women play a very important part in educational matters in London. At the election for members of the school board just held women were candidates in six out of the eleven divisions. This liberal recognition is based upon the theory that every woman who is a mother is in part the educator of her children, and is compelled in her own fashion to solve educational problems.

Now is the time we hear cant expressions about the miseries of wealth, but they are trifles when compared to the pangs of poverty. The wealthy may have some bitter experiences brought on by the possession of riches, but the poor and destitute are the ones that endure the pains of deprivation. The heart burnings which may at times accompany wealth always find an easy cure from the same source, while the hunger and cold of poverty has no remedy.

We observe that Senator Felton has promptly introduced a bill to amend the Chinese Exclusion Act, to require Chinese removed from the United States to be sent to China, instead of the country from whence they came. The President in his late message made the recommendation that such legislation be enacted to avoid the conflict of court decisions in construing the Act. The amendment goes further, and provides that the burden of proof shall be on any Chinese laborer or person who shall claim the right to remain in the United States.

The story of Lord Russell's betrayal of a servant girl in his household seems to have been introduced into the divorce trial merely as a minor bit of testimony—an episode, as it were—in the graver proceedings. Such a lapse from honor on the part of a young man is something to be winked at in England. "Young men will be young men, and servant girls are not Lucretias," said one British Tarquin many years ago, in apologizing for the sins of young Englishmen of rank; and practically the same view of the matter is taken in London society to-day.

A gentleman familiar with Utah affairs declares that in politics the Mormons are sly as snakes. They only put out enough force to defeat the other party at an election, and thus it has been impossible to get a correct idea of their real strength. Going by the last census, however, they could outvote the Gentiles in Utah by about 10,000. The orthodox Mormons place their church above everything else. They acknowledge no allegiance to the government, and are absolutely controlled in their votes by the wishes of the church officers as expressed in their organ, the Herald.

It is strange—it is passing strange—that a woman—a Massachusetts woman—can be found to declare that the verb "damn" is not a profane expression. But so it is. Perhaps, after all, however, she wishes to withdraw the sting of the verb and make it sound less harshly to the feminine ear. To hear Judge McFarland say "damn" conveys no idea of profanity. It is absolutely edifying and comical. A Massachusetts court once decided that "damn" is not profanity. We think, however, that when a fellow stubs his rheumatic toe, the expression "damn" which follows has something of a profane intent.

An old housekeeper declares that but one side of the servant girl topic is ever given in the press, and that great injustice is done the lady help. She avers that the average servant girl, on leaving a place, invariably conveys to her new mistress a great amount of information as to the domestic life and eccentricities of the family lately employing her, omitting nothing that she can possibly think of. Some of this may be true, and some of it may not be perfectly accurate, but it is all entertaining, and the system enables the ladies of a community to know just what is going on in every home. Yet no credit is ever given the poor girl for what she knows.

A Nyack paper tells of the following incident that occurred at a wedding in the village: A recent wedding was so interrupted that the friends of the wedded pair found special reason to congratulate them when the ceremony was at last over. All went merrily until the bridegroom was called upon to produce the wedding ring. In vain he felt in his trousers pocket for the indispensable article. Nothing could be found except a hole through which the ring had evidently fallen into his boot, which he wore. What was he to do? "Take your boot off," said the parson. The suspense and silence were painful. The organist, at the dominie's bidding, struck up a "voluntary." The young man removed his boot, the ring was found, also a hole in his stocking, and the worthy minister remarked, evidently with more than the ceremony in mind, "Young man, it is time you were married."

It is stated that a prisoner who was confined to solitary imprisonment for life, obtained a copy of the Bible and ascertained the following facts: The Bible contains 3,586,489 letters, 773,992 words, 31,173 verses, 1,189 chapters, and 66 books. The word "and" occurs 46,277 times; the word "Lord" 1,857 times; the word "reverend" but once, which is in the 9th verse of the 111th psalm. The middle verse is the 8th of the 118th psalm. The 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra contains all the letters of the alphabet, except J. The finest chapter to read is the 26th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. The 19th chapter of II Kings and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are alike. The longest verse is the 9th of the 8th chapter of St. John. The 8th, 15th, 21st, and 31st verses of the 107th psalm are alike. All the verses of the 136th psalm end alike. There are no words or names of more than six syllables. It might be added that the shortest verse in the bible is John xi, 35: "Jesus wept." In the old testament the shortest verse is in first Chronicles, i, 1.

One of the daily papers, in an editorial this week, makes a mistake that calls for a correction and without any exhibition of pedantry. Newspapers are, or should be, educators, and therefore should not commit faults that may lead the ignorant astray. The item alluded to was an article in the News commenting on an ungodly scrimmage in a church, where one part of the congregation made an attack on the officiating ministers and tore the letters "I. H. S." from the communion cloth. In the course of its denunciations of such conduct, the editor says those letters stand for the Greek names of Jesus. Now such is not the fact, nor are many of the other interpretations that are given of late years, such as "I Have Suffered," In Hoc Signo, (In this sign) etc. The letter I in the words is the one formerly used instead of J before the introduction of the J into the alphabets. So that the I. H. S. seen so frequently in Catholic churches and works are the initial letters of Iesus Hominum Salvator, or in English, Jesus, Savior of Men.

Aged Indian Chiefs.

It is interesting to talk with civilized Indians and learn from them what they may know of the present and past conditions of their race. Speaking of the prevalence of consumption among the Indians on the Klamath agency, calls to mind that a few years will find those Indians nearly all in their graves. Henry Jackson of Klamath assigned a very plausible reason for their decline. He says their food now is different from that of the wild Indian, and their habits of life are very changed. Formerly they roamed at will, clad scantily with rough skins, or naked, just as fancy suited them. Now they are clothed and housed and often removed to different climes, and the changes of temperature at once make themselves felt and attack the lungs. Mr. Jackson talked freely of the old Indian chiefs.

"Sronchin," the last chief of the Modocs, and one of the leaders in the Modoc war, is still living. He is weak, and stone blind, and must be considerably over a hundred years of age. "Choctaw," the last commander of the Snakes, surrendered his life and passed on to the happy hunting ground only three weeks ago. He also was blind, and was a hundred or more years of age. "Allen David," who used to be a great chief among the Klamaths, is still living, although at an advanced age. The light has also gone out of his eyes, and he has to depend on his people for food and care. The tribe relations are all broken up, and from Mr. Jackson's words it seems that very soon the last of the original chiefs will have passed to that bourne whence no traveler returns. Although not disappearing with the buffalo, as it was years ago said they would do, the American Indian will not be far behind the beast of the prairie in passing from view.

The Blarney Stone.

The village of Blarney is in the south of Ireland, about four miles from Cork. Blarney Castle was built by Cormack MacCarthy, the Strong, fourth lord of Muskerry, about the middle of the fifteenth century. The ruins of the famous old fortress are visited by thousands of tourists every year. This is largely on account of a tradition which has been attached for some centuries to one of the stones used in building the castle. This stone is said to communicate to the tongue that touches it the gift of gentle, insinuating speech, and that has given rise to the accusation when any one is of particularly sweet accent that he or she has "kissed the Blarney stone."

The less a man knows about children the more crazy theories he has in his head about how they should be controlled.

Handsome Tribute to Mrs. E. B. Crocker.

On the eve of Mrs. Crocker's departure from this city, the members of the Art Museum Association and a large number of personal friends gave her an informal reception. After the party had all assembled, Joseph Steffens, one of the patrons of the Museum Association, handed her the following beautiful testimonial:

MRS. MARGARET E. CROCKER: To-night again we meet to greet you in this treasure-house of Art—grounds, temple and contents, a trinity of benefactions, your gracious gift to us. It would take a volume to catalogue your memories, sweet and sacred, that yet flit and live around these grounds, and which were real life to you even before this temple's foundation stones were laid. To quietly recall the thoughts and acts that led up to the perfection of a plan and this structure, and gathered in and filled it so judiciously with varied, rare and costly treasure, would only open up a book to us that is rightly closed; for to you its words are sacred light—yea, almost life. This is no time to marshal renewed thanks or order tens of thousands of child and adult gratuities into line with music and floral fragrance to show appreciation or human love for you and what you have done.

All minds that are worth thinking, all gratuities that are worth holding, and all memories that learn facts and cherish them, will in this section of the state ever live and cluster around you wherever you are, in this life and the one to come. These feelings will be as varied, but as true and harmonious, as are the frescoes on yonder ceiling when flooded with light. Time will enrich them, as it will the light and shade on yonder Hill's Yosemite.

Such genuine feelings are as surely the outgrowth and outpourings of correct minds and hearts as beauty springs from such architecture as we now see around us. This shrine, where children come to see and learn, where adults come to enjoy and appreciate, and where genius comes to bow and worship, begets hope, faith, gratitude, and love.

As the living light of the New Testament is the name and life of the Nazarine, as the silver gleam of our American history is the name and life of Washington, so in Sacramento's history will your name and life ever be the one shining light. The thoughtless few may trifle and forget, but the thinking many will always remember, appreciate and love. This magnificent structure, filled with varied gems, all of your work and gathering; this shrine of art, part and parcel of your life, your labor and joy, you cannot leave; you will always tarry here. Then, too, near by there is a silent city where polished marble scatters midnight gloom with starlight gathered from the skies, where bright flowers impart a cheer and fragrance far and near, and bending evergreens invite to tears and prayer. You will ever linger there. Such records of human life and memory hold one as an anchor holds a light canoe. This was always so from the beginning, and shows the heaven-forged links that join the human with the eternal life. But, then, where is the earth-bound soul that wants one always here, and nowhere else? Go meet the rising sun, where you can gather round you those whose hearts and lives grew out of yours when it was morning with you; where blood affinity, the very tree of life, both shades and yields what most you need; where happy childhood hangs around like budding fruit to bring you hope and strength from joyous daily life. That will be a resting place, a paradise, you have well earned. And while you move therein, and leisure hails you, now and then just turn to the bright and morning sun and bid it go and drive away the darkness and the dew from western riches that you love. And when the happy day is spent and evening pleasures put away; when night is on and darkness like a velvet curtain gathers round to soothe, and invoke sleep and rest, just close your eyes and look this way, for you can see the sun still king of the brightest day, or, gently throwing gold and shaded lines across the treasures of your heart.

Then go or come, just as your wish begets, may all the joys of friends and earth be yours. Wherever you are, and whether going or coming, well or ill, may heaven attend and bring you joyous peace both day and night.

The Old, Old Story.

Tom—"Yes, we swore to remain true to each other. Then I went away for a long time."

Jack—"And she was always in your thoughts?"

"I thought a good deal of her—I mean I thought of her a good deal."

"And when you met you embraced her fondly, of course."

"I would probably have done so were it not for our surroundings."

"The encounter was public?"

"Yes, and both her husband and my wife were present."—Yankee Blade.

Typographical Errors.

Nothing can be so disheartening to a writer as to find his pet phrases turned into nonsense by the intelligent compositor. "The printer of Longfellow's Dante," says Col. T. W. Higginson, "told me that the poet had looked forward with eager anticipation to its appearance, and when the first volume of the sumptuous book was laid upon the breakfast table he opened at once upon—a misprint. It was many weeks, my informant said, before the poet could revert with any satisfaction to what he then regarded his greatest work." Baron Grimm, in his memoirs, relates the not improbable story of a French writer who died in a fit of anger when he found his favorite work, revised by himself with great care, had been printed with more than 300 errors, half of them made by the corrector of the press. But it is a little more difficult to swallow the unauthenticated anecdote of the Italian poet who, when on his way to present a copy of verses to the Pope, found a mistake of a single letter, which broke his heart of chagrin, so that he died the day after. We can sympathize with the author of a religious work mentioned by Disraeli, which consisted of only 172 pages, of which fifteen were devoted to errata. We can even pardon the vanity which led him to imagine that Satan, fearful of the influence which the book might wield, had tampered with the types, and that the very printers had worked under the same malign influence.

Nevertheless, it is easy to find a less startling explanation for the ordinary typographical errors. Blunders of this sort may be roughly grouped under three heads: Errors of the ear, errors of the eye, and errors arising from what printers call a "foul case." A compositor while at work reads over a few words of the copy and retains them in his memory until his fingers have picked up the necessary types. While the memory is thus repeating a phrase, it is only natural for certain words to be supplanted by others similar in sound—thus, "mistake" might appear in type as "must take," as, in fact, it did in the first folio of Hamlet, act 3, scene 1. "Idol Votarist" (Timon, act 4, scene 3.) into "Idol Votarist." "Long delays, Titus," into "Long days." The eye often deceives the compositor, especially when the copy is more or less illegible. Take away a dot, and "this time goes manly" (Macbeth, act 4, scene 3.) becomes "this tune goes manly." The third class of errors needs more explanation. A compositor works at what is called "a case," a wooden drawer divided into numerous receptacles, each containing one letter only, say all a's or all b's. When from a shake or other accident the letters become misplaced, the result is technically known as a "foul case." The compositor's fingers may, under these circumstances, readily pick out the wrong letter from the right box without being conscious of the fact.

These are mistakes to which even the intelligent compositor is liable; but it is hardly necessary to say that all compositors are not intelligent. The machine printer, or "blacksmith," as he is technically called, is a familiar figure in every printing office. It is he who makes a hurried guess at the copy before him, without caring whether it makes sense or not—who substitutes "comic" for "cosmic," "human" for "known," "plaut" for "planet," "I am better" for "Gambetta," "no cows, no cream" for "no cross, no crown," and "shaving the queen" for "showing the queer." This is a sort of printer who made a distinguished traveler die "in the richness of sin" instead of the "interior of Asia," and who described a Chicago exquisite as one whose "manners would alarm a drowning man," when what the writer really said was that they "would adorn a drawing room." Richard A. Proctor records the most remarkable change the printers ever arranged for him as appearing in the proof of a little book on "Spectroscopic Analysis," which he wrote for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The words which in the work itself now appear, as they were certainly written, "Lines, bands and stria in the violet part of spectra," were printed in the proof, "Links, bonds and stripes for the violent kind of spectres." An editor who wished to compliment a soldier as "a battle-scarred veteran" was so deeply grieved when he found the types had made him speak of "a battle-scarred veteran" that the next day he inserted an apology and an erratum, which read, "the bottle-scarred veteran." "I remember," says a writer in American Notes and Queries, "to have written something about a concert at which was sung Millard's 'Ave Maria,' and it actually appeared that Miss So and So had sung with much feeling Mulligan's 'Avenue Maria.' At a musical in the same neighborhood a young lady played upon the piano a ballad in A flat major. The local paper had it that she had sung a ballad called 'A Fat Major.'"—Illustrated American.

"It must be a painful sight," remarks a thoughtful exchange, "to see a shoemaker breathing his last." And a most unfortunate man is a tailor whose goose is cooked.

If there is a bigger bore in this world than the man who is always telling stories, it is the man who will not listen when we have a story to tell.

Pianos and Organs.

We invite the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Messrs. A. C. Shaw & Co., 1023 Eighth street, who carry one of the largest and finest stocks of pianos and organs of any house in the city. They are offering special inducements to the holiday trade, and intending purchasers would do well to examine their instruments before buying. We know of nothing that would make a finer or more acceptable Christmas present than a world-renowned Knabe or Hemme & Long piano.

A New Idea of a Husband.

That breeziest of feminine gossipers, "Madge," writes in the London Truth of widowers as husbands as follows: Eva is going to be married to her next-door neighbor in her own county, a man with a delightful income and pleasant enough personally to be no incumbrance upon the property. He is a widower.

Here I pause—for it is a subject on which volumes could be written. Some girls have a great dislike to the idea of marrying a widower. They think that his brain and memory are so permeated with the perfections of the dear departed (her little faults all forgotten) that he would be terribly critical about a second wife. This is a con. To set against it is an excellent pro. A widower is more likely to have been weaned a little bit from the selfish ways of single blessedness than a man who has not been married.

Mothers usually spoil their sons and train the young men's sisters to the same. The salutary experiences of matrimonial life tend to reduce the egotism and self-conceit which are the natural consequence of this. So, really, the ideal man to marry is a widower whose first wife has been rather unsatisfactory and who has been generally known to be so. He cannot pretend to sigh over the lost glories of his first hymeneal enterprise, and he will be appreciative of the domestic virtues that contrast with the dear departed's lack of them.

Eva's sentiments toward her future husband may be gathered from one of her utterances to Maud and me last night:

"I have always thought that the very nicest man to marry would be one who is pleasant to live with and not very pleasant to lose."

"What would St. Paul have said to such revolutionary ideas?"

"I am rising toward the sky. The sunshine is on my head. Winter is on my head and eternal spring is in my heart. There I breathe at this hour the fragrance of the lilies, the violets, and roses as at twenty years ago. The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which invite me. It is marvelous, yet simple. It is a fairy tale, and it is historic. For half a century I have been writing my thoughts in prose and verse—history, philosophy, drama, romance, tradition, satire, ode, and song. I have tried all, but I feel I have not said a thousandth part of what is in me. When I go down to the grave, I can say like many others, I have finished my day's work, but I cannot say I have finished my life. My days will begin the next morning. The tomb is not a blind alley; it is a thoroughfare. It closes on the twilight to open on the dawn."—Victor Hugo.

On the banks of the Susquehanna is a grave with this epitaph: "Charles Lewis. He voted for Abraham Lincoln." In Baton Rouge is the following epitaph: "Here lies the body of David Jones. His last words were: 'I die a Christian and a Democrat.'" And there is a grave at Stonington, Vt., which has the following epitaph: "When Rhode Island, by her legislation from 1843 to 1850, repudiated her revolutionary debt, Dr. Richmond removed from that state to this borough and selected this as his family burial place, unwilling that the remains of himself and family should be disgraced by forming part of a repudiating state."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening the Cleveland Minstrels will play a return engagement at the Metropolitan. The names of the artists of this company are sufficient to insure a full house.

A choice literary and musical programme, followed by a dance, will be given by local talent, under the auspices of the bureau of relief, Knights of Pythias, at Castle hall, Saturday evening, December 19th. Proceeds go to bureau of relief.

On Monday night the Irwin Sisters will produce their new farce comedy, Boys and Girls, at the Metropolitan. The Irwin Sisters are well known to the theater-goers, and have always been prime favorites in their specialties. The comedy is well spoken of by the eastern press.

Our young friend J. Desmond, in his splendid tenor solos, was a surprise to the music-loving people who heard him the other evening at the kindergarten fete. Mr. Desmond certainly possesses a remarkable voice, and he is destined to take high rank as a tenor. As soon as the operatic managers learn of his wonderful power there will doubtless be a demand for Mr. Desmond.

The Manner in Which the Church of Rome Selects Its Head.

The pope is elected by the cardinals, who are usually seventy-two in number, and they do it in this way: Ten days after the death of the pope the cardinals enter into conclave—the place where the election is held. Each one is given a small room. From there they proceed to the chapel, where the bulls relative to the election of the pope are read and sworn to. No cardinal is permitted to leave the conclave until the election is over. All doors and windows towards the outside are walled up, with the exception of one door, through which the more distant cardinals arriving later may come in. This entrance is strongly guarded by soldiers. This is done to cut off all outside pressure and influence, and thereby to insure an entirely free and independent election. The casting of the votes takes place in the chapel twice a day, at 6 A. M. and 2 P. M. Two-thirds of the votes are necessary to lawfully elect a pope. If less votes are cast in favor of one person, the tickets voted are burned in the fireplace of the chapel. Every day at 6 o'clock in the morning and 2 o'clock in the afternoon the people of the city are watching the chapel chimney; if smoke therefrom arises they know that no pope has been elected. As soon as the necessary number of votes unite for one, then, if he is present, he is asked whether or not he will accept the pontificate. The pope-elect then kneels, prays and decides; if he is not present, a solemn embassy is at once deputed to him.

The honor of primacy accepted, the new pope changes his name. He does so to imitate St. Peter, whose original name, "Simon," was changed into that of "Peter," as soon as our Lord elected him the head of his church. After this the pontiff puts on the papal vestments, and adorns his fingers with the fisherman's ring. The election is then publicly proclaimed by one of the cardinals from the loggia of St. Peter's church: "I announce to you a great joy! We have a pope in the person of his eminence, most reverend lord N. N., who has taken the name N." Then all the bells of the Catholic churches of Rome ring, the Swiss guards fire artillery salutes, the people shout, St. Peter's church choir intones the "Te Deum," and the pope gives the solemn benediction, urbis et orbis.

The present pope was elected after only thirty-six hours of conclave after the third scrutiny. Leo XIII is of short stature; his figure is slight, frail looking; his features are angular. His brow is remarkably high; his nose Roman; his eyes black and brilliant. They are inexpressibly piercing, and give an extraordinary vivacity to his countenance. His voice is clear and ringing. He speaks slowly, but with good precision. Always very carefully prepares his discourses, but seldom writes them down; only after they have been delivered he dictates them from memory to the secretary. His right hand trembles very much, a consequence of typhoid fever many years ago. His leanness is phenomenal—mere skin and bones. Leo XIII is nervous, his health tenacious. For over fifteen years he never suffered from anything more serious than a passing cold. Longevity is hereditary in the Pecci family—one of his brothers recently died at the age of 84; another brother at 91.

Girls have no objection, on general principles, to being admired, but if you think they are going to sit all evening in their respective family parlors and best clothes for the sole purpose of entertaining you because you chance to be of the opposite sex and like to stare at women, you're fast approaching the time when you'll be told, as a rule, that "the ladies are not at home." You must learn to talk; you must learn something about many things which at present don't interest you, if you expect ever to become acceptable company to girls—even to girls who themselves do not know much, and among whom you will find most of the prettiest.

Von Moltke and His Visitor.

The parents of a young soldier who was a private in a Prussian cavalry regiment during the Franco-Prussian war became terribly anxious about him. Several battles had been fought and they had received no news of their boy. They had followed the army, and after some hesitation, the father went to see Gen. Von Moltke, who was understood to receive visitors at a certain hour in the early morning. Strange to say, the father was admitted to see the great field marshal.

"What is your business?" said Moltke; "use as few words as possible." The visitor explained that he wished to know the fate of his son, a private in a certain regiment. Moltke smiled, but not unkindly, and drew from his pocket a square of cardboard covered with dots, lines, and crosses of various colors. "This line," he said, "indicates the line of march of your son's regiment. These dots mark the distances of each forced march. To-morrow morning at 7 o'clock the regiment must be at this point here. Take notice of the situation."

He said no more and the interview ended. Long before the hour named, the father was at the point indicated on the map. Just before 7 o'clock the trumpets of the advance guard were heard in the distance, and precisely at the hour, the father saw his son.

The Sensitive Visitor.

The night was bitter. Pride and I Sat gazing on it thro' the pane.
Who can that gallant horseman be
That at our casement draweth rein?

We turn our faces, Pride and I,
And yet the pleading and the pain
Of that one look—nay, out of sight
He's passed into the night and rain.

Who could the bold intruder be?
Alas, to-day 'tis but too plain.
His name was opportunity.
He never came to us again.

THE LAST WORD.

When Capt. Norris went to rejoin his regiment in Ireland he asked me to look after his wife. She was a pretty woman, whose only fault, if it can be considered so, was her love of amusement. She had four children, and was anxious to give them a better education than could be procured in England with her limited means.

Of all the Norris children, Louise was her father's favorite, but to her the mother was severe and harsh.

One evening our small circle had assembled as usual at my house, and dispersed about 10 o'clock, Mrs. Norris being the first to leave. When my husband and I were alone we chatted over the little incidents and gossips of the evening. At last I took my candle and went to my room, a front one. I had undressed when I heard a noise at the window, like hail rattling against it. Knowing that the night had been very fine, I drew back the curtain in surprise, and saw Mrs. Norris standing on the path.

The servants had long gone to bed so I hurriedly drew my dressing-wrapper round me and ran down stairs.

When I had opened the hall door, before I had time to ask a question, Mrs. Norris exclaimed:

"Oh! I fear something dreadful has happened to Charles!"

"Why do you think so?" I said; have you heard anything of him?"

"No," she answered, "I have not heard of or from him lately; yet, as you know, I was not uneasy about him and was quite happy and cheerful with you this evening. I left you early to go to my children; they were all asleep; I went to bed directly, but in about 10 minutes after, by the light of the night-lamp, I saw my husband standing by my bedside; he had a fearful gash in his throat, from which the blood was pouring. He spoke to me and said:

"Farewell! be kind to poor Lou!"

"In a moment he disappeared. When I could collect my thoughts I dressed and came to you, my dear friend, to tell you that I fear something dreadful has happened to my husband, and I must go to him. Will you look after my children till my return?"

Traveling in those days was a most disagreeable process; the slowness, cold, dirt and misery of sailing-vessels and coaches made people generally reflect a great deal before they undertook a journey, unless they could afford to travel post. I therefore tried to persuade Mrs. Norris that she had only dreamed of her husband.

She replied: "I had not even closed my eyes, and I saw him as plainly as I do you."

Then I tried to persuade her to await for the arrival of the next mail from England. "No," she said, "he might be dying even while we are consulting together."

I asked what she thought most likely to have befallen him.

"He might be fatally wounded, if not killed, in a duel."

Those were the days when duelling was in its prime; when, if a man fancied a word or joke touched his honor, he felt it incumbent on him to call out the offender, though he were his best friend, and endeavor to wash off the stain in his blood.

I saw it was useless trying to dissuade Mrs. Norris, so I now hurriedly dressed, and helped her preparations for departure, promising to be a mother to her children in her absence.

She traveled post to the nearest port, thence sailed to England, and proceeded immediately to her husband's quarters in Ireland.

She was the only inside passenger by the coach, and to beguile her sad thoughts bought a newspaper at the first town where they stopped to change horses. At the next stoppage the guard found my poor friend senseless.

She had found in the paper an account of the death of Captain Norris by suicide at the very moment she had seen his apparition.

When Mrs. Norris returned to her children, and had to some degree recovered from this awful shock, she spoke with calmness of what she called her "last interview" with her husband. I remarked that even if she had dreamed it, it would have been extraordinary; she was firm in asserting she had not closed her eyes, and but just extinguished her candle. So I said no more; but other friends were more pertinacious in insisting his presence could not have been a reality.

Her answer was invariably, "I saw him as plainly as I see you."

If you have a half dollar of 1838 with an "O" above the date you can get $12 for it.

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Innocence.

A solitary country road—cool and dark in the shadow of the woods, hot and glaring where it emerged and after a short run dipped into the valley. In the valley a pretty village along the banks of the river that wound through it, great myriad-eyed factories; in the outskirts of the village a castellated villa, home of the proprietor of "The Works."

By the roadside, just at the entrance to the woods, says Short Stories, lay a something that it were unjust to call a brute, since it is left to man alone to produce a thing so abhorrent—hirsute, uncouth, horrible. Polluting the sweet air with his foul breath and the tender wayside blossoms with his filthy rags, he lay there motionless, his bristling chin resting upon his grimy hands, his blood-shot eyes fixed sullenly upon the village.

"Work, curse 'em! Me work!" he snarled, his lowering eyes upon the villa. "Does he work? No!"

Suddenly a sound of steps was heard, and the man drew back into the bushes, where he could watch, unseen.

A girl was coming along the wood road alone—a fair childish creature, with the fine delicate beauty of the petted offspring of wealth. Golden hair fell about her lovely innocent face; one hand held flowers; the other hung by her side, and on one finger blazed a splendid diamond.

The man behind the bushes quivered as the girl came near. His coarse lips drew back from his discolored teeth, savage cunning was in his lurid eyes; his fingers moved greedily. With sudden noiselessness he rose and stepped forward.

The girl stopped; her angelic face blanched; the innocent blue eyes fixed themselves upon those of the hardened wretch with a look that might have softened the heart of a stone.

And suddenly the cruel face changed—savage ferocity, brutal desire, vanished—and the hulking form shrank, trembled, and drew humbly back to let the maiden pass, as though that pure glance had pierced the hard crust of viciousness down to that better nature that never can be utterly eliminated.

Had it? No. Walking behind the maiden, until that moment unseen, was a superb stag-hound, whose two rows of magnificent teeth reflected the sun-rays even more strikingly than did the splendid diamond on the girl's finger.

The Soul Laughs.

What is it gets drunk when one takes too much whisky?—his body or his mind? or, more comprehensively, his soul. Everyone has seen a man's body drunk while his mind was sober; that is to say, he could control neither his arms nor his legs, but he could his thought, and be entirely capable of transacting business safely.

The most satisfactory notion that one can form of the strange phenomena which the society of psychic research has been investigating is, that they are the product of nerve force, as it is fairly demonstrated that they occur only under certain conditions.

These phenomena come nearest to what are imagined to be the pure soul forces. Health, it is held, is dependent on nervous equilibrium. When one is sick it is because there is an excess of nervous action in one direction and a deficiency in another. To restore the equality of this nervous action is to restore health.

Suggestion, a purely psychical thing, is the agency of this restoration. The sick man is put in the way of utilizing his own forces to heal himself. The soul turns doctor of the body. Through suggestion the victim of drink becomes his own reformer. So it is the body which gets drunk, and not the soul, although the soul may wickedly enjoy the sight of the body making a fool of itself.

So we have the statement that the drinkers cured by hypnotic suggestion "have undergone a moral transformation;" and the further statement that this cannot be brought about by any drug. "The bi-chloride of gold may serve a subsidiary purpose as a tonic," but the cure is effected by faith which comes in the way of suggestion.—Pittsburg Times.

Why Are These Things Thus?

Why, questions "Bab," should every woman in a street car smile when another woman gets in who has forgotten to fasten her belt and has two white strings hanging down in the back?

Why should everybody look overjoyed when the conductor gives a woman with a tiny little bit of a purse the change for $2 in five cent pieces?

Why should everybody smile with glee when a big fat woman plants her foot on the polished shoe of an inoffensive young man who is making a great effort to be polite and give her his seat?

Why should everybody look at everybody else when somebody has not paid his fare?

Why does everybody smile most sarcastically when an innocent little baby cries because it regrets it was ever born?

Why do people do these things? It's because the leaven of original sin is still in them, and they take a monkey-like delight in the woes of their neighbors.

Physical Improvement of the Sex.

Several English medical journals have recently called attention to a fact sustained by common observation, that the young women of the present day are better developed physically, taller, plumper, stronger and healthier than the young women of 50, 100, 150 or 200 years ago, and that in this continuous and perceptible improvement of condition and aspect there are no steps backward. One journal has called attention to the circumstance that whereas a century or two ago a handsome woman inspired sentiments of such an admiring curiosity that her arrival or departure drew vast crowds and rewarded the patient waiting of hundreds; beauty of the same sort is so general nowadays as to evoke no ripple of excitement.

That the old water-works building has been able to stand under the tank of water above it, and the attacks that have of late been made as to its integrity, is creditable to the antique structure. Some years since, the building was pronounced unsafe by the press and the officers, and we then expressed the opinion that it would not come down "of its own motion." We have seen nothing since to change our views. True, wood-work will decay, but it can be replaced. Mr. Goodell strikes it about right when he says: "Only think of it! here we have a building whose main walls are two feet thick, and four cross walls nearly as thick, and all bonded together and laid in good cement mortar. The idea of such a building falling without giving any warning is perfectly absurd. I will make an assertion right here—that there is not a person living in Sacramento to-day who will live long enough to see the building fall, if it is left alone." We are not to be understood as advocating its use for city-hall purposes. A municipality of the pretensions of Sacramento should have a city hall that will be in degree creditable; but so long as the authorities are disposed to put up with the present situation, there is no reason to abandon a building that, while unsightly, is safe and can be so preserved. If the trustees had the backbone to submit to the people a proposition to levy a special tax for the erection of a suitable city hall, we doubt not it would meet the approval of the people. There would be a double satisfaction: the city would have an appropriate public edifice; the bondholders and their allies would have a new pudding-string to chew at.

By the way, what has become of the bond agitation—the proposition to immortalize ourselves as imbeciles by paying off the city debt in, as a contemporary puts it, six years? Recently the enthusiasts pledged its wiping-off in shorter time; it seems our inhabitants are being gradually allowed more rope. Perhaps it will be the people will pay it off when they get good and ready, and will let their enemies transpire in the meantime. THEMIS did steadily fight the unjust proposition to saddle the iniquitous debt upon the generation of this day, and did maintain that instead of raising additional revenue for the bond-holders, we should spend our extra cash in putting in a system of sewers and the erection of needed public buildings. That an improved system of sewerage is imperatively demanded is mournfully manifested by our present death rate and by the numerous cases of sickness that exist. We do hope time will come when something practical will result from the periodical agitation in the press and public meetings of this question which so much concerns the health of the people.

Upon the discharge of the San Francisco grand jury last Wednesday, Judge Wallace took occasion, in a very lengthy address, to justify his course, and to arraign the supreme court for its decision, in the case of Elwood Bruner. Leaving out of question the gross impropriety of a judge of an inferior court publicly attacking the justices of the supreme court (of which impropriety no one could be better informed than Judge Wallace), we will discuss briefly the two main points of Judge Wallace's address. He relies upon the Southwell case to show that the writ of prohibition would not lie in this case. But the point decided in that case was that, the statute not having provided for a motion to set aside an indictment on the ground of the illegality of the grand jury, the question could not be considered on appeal; and yet Judge Wallace strongly dissented from the majority opinion of the court in that case, and afterwards, in the Colby and Hunter cases, held to his views expressed in the Southwell case. If the opinion in that case is law, Mr. Bruner would have had no remedy by appeal.

But it is a legal axiom that for every wrong there is a remedy; and in the Bruner case the only remedy was by prohibition. In the Southwell case, the judge, in appointing the coroner to summon the uncompleted portion of the grand jury—three only having been selected from the drawing made from the box—stated in his order that he appointed the coroner because he intended to charge the grand jury to specially investigate the sheriff's office, because of gross irregularities in that office having been called to his notice. Judge Wallace then held that his action was illegal, and that the indictment should have been set aside. How can he reconcile his opinion then and afterwards expressed with that he now holds? His second point is that the Bruner case conflicts with the decision in Strouse vs. The Police Court. But the answer is plain that it does not. In the Strouse case the petitioner was charged with a simple misdemeanor, the violation of a city ordinance, upon the trial of which, if convicted, he had the absolute right to give a bond to stay the execution of the fine, and with the right of an immediate hearing of an appeal in the superior court. In that case, he had "a plain, speedy and adequate remedy at law." It is nonsense to say that a charge of misdemeanor can be classed with one of felony—the one with an immediate appeal to the superior court; the other, with its long delay and intermediate imprisonment and disgrace by confinement in a state-prison. We think that the supreme court has given a righteous decision in the Bruner case, and that, when the fogs of bias and prejudice have lifted and disappeared, it will receive the universal approval of the bench, the bar and the people.

Were an ordinary mortal asked, "Is the possession of wealth desirable?" he would undoubtedly reply, "It is, indeed." However the question is debatable. Much depends on how much the wealth is, the shape in which it exists, and the taste of the individual possessing it. The worship of gold has never brought happiness; it has ever been a fatal infatuation. Midas, it is said, did secure the favor of Bacchus, and of the god did request that everything he touched might be turned to gold. His request was granted, but as his food became gold the moment he touched it, he prayed the god to take the favor back. He was ordered to bathe in the Pactolus, and the river ever after rolled over golden sands. Less of realization was there in the experience of the boy who chased the rain-bow to find the pot of treasure at its foot. His adventure was, however, of value. There are, in truth, many who would be so thoughtless as to repeat the wish of Midas, and who would, with little provocation, join the boy in his delusive chase. Even in this day the alchemist of old is of some the prototype, and hope is not lost there will be discovered a process for the transmutation of baser metals into gold.

In the legends of all, people's gold and its possession plays a prominent part. Gray did write, "What female heart can gold dispise?" He did allude to the fable of the comely Atalanta, the swiftest of all mortals. She vowed to marry the man who could out-strip her in a race. Milanion threw down three golden apples, and Atalanta, stopping to pick them up, lost the race and gained a husband. In the Greek fable a countryman had a goose that laid golden eggs; thinking to make himself rich, he killed the goose to get the whole stock of eggs, but lost everything. It would seem this homely illustration will apply somewhat pertinently to the foolish averice of some who now live.

The possession of great wealth carries with it a curse in very many instances. Certain it is there are attendant circumstances that are by no means agreeable. To hoard and guard it renders its possessor a slave; he is compelled to deny to himself the pleasures that are enjoyed by the less "fortunate" majority. The cares of life are not eased by the quiet enjoyment of home life at evening and on Sunday; time often comes when the millionaire is more bothered to get ready cash than the mechanic he employs; there is the ceaseless conflict of wealth against wealth, and eternal vigilance is the price of its retention. The experiences recently of Russell Sage and Cyrus W. Field, are illustrative of some of the serious embarrassments of the possession of wealth.

The history of great accumulations is a curious study, and remarkable it is how few have remained intact for any considerable time after the death of those who amassed them. The holdings of the Rothschilds, Vanderbilts and the Astors are noted exceptions, and in each of these instances the founders were poor men. Mayer Anselm Rothschild sprang from a poor Jewish family, and began life as a clerk in Hanover. He then established himself as a banker at Frankfort and was brought in relation to the German governments. In 1806 the elector, William of Hesse Cassel, on his flight before the French invasion, deposited some $5,000,000 for safe keeping with Rothschild for 8 years, without interest. The capital was returned to William's son in 1823, but the profit of its judicious investment was the source of the colossal fortune that is intact to this day; from it governments borrow, and it is a powerful factor in financial and mercantile operations the world over. Cornelius Vanderbilt started life with nothing, and was averse to education. At the age of 16, in the early part of this century, he bought a small boat which he plied between the island and New York. From this start he rapidly extended his operations, became interested in steamship and railway lines and, at his death in January, 1877, left a fortune of millions. So early as 1864 his accumulations were estimated at $40,000,000; to-day it would be difficult to calculate what the fortune is. John Jacob Astor was born at Walldorf, near Heidelberg, in 1763, and was the son of a peasant. His younger years were spent on a farm, and at sixteen he went to London. In 1783 he embarked for the United States, and brought with him a few hundred dollars' worth of musical instruments to dispose of on commission. On the voyage he made the acquaintance of a furrier, at whose suggestion he exchanged his instruments at New York for furs which he shipped to London and disposed of at advantage. He established himself as a fur dealer in New York, and at the beginning of the century was worth $250,000. In 1811 he set about the establishment of trading posts on the Pacific coast of North America and created a monopoly that yielded him fabulous returns. Judiciously he did invest in New York real estate, and it seems to be the unwritten law of the family to buy land but never to sell. In our own state, in most instances death has brought about a division of large fortunes, and, as a rule, litigation has stepped in to assist.

The possession of moderate wealth, coupled with a judgment as to its most satisfactory enjoyment, is what is desirable. If a man but knows when he has enough, and has the sense to "enjoy life" as his tastes incline, he will have little cause for unhappiness or uneasiness. About as pleasant a situation as can be occupied is that of a man who has enough, who can lay aside the cares of life and spend the balance of his days in quietly catering to his inclinations. Some there are whose bent is to travel; others, to pursue some hobby in science, art or literature; others seek the pleasures of social life. To be able to do as one pleases, relieves in large measure the feeling of despondency in our fellow men; for be one a king or a mendicant, he must bow to the judgment and will of others. The sovereign must obey the commands of his physician and must follow the advice of his ministers. Absurd, though sensible, was the plan adopted by a sailor. He had followed the sea for years and suffered the hardships of a subordinate. At the ending a fortune was left him. He purchased a house and hired a servant, whom he directed at stated hours to rap on his chamber door and cry out the "bells" and announce that "all was well." He was satisfied that he could control, and that when the servant announced "eight bells, and all is well," he could respond, "Go to —! you rascal," and roll over and go to sleep again.

It is downright heresy to attempt, in the minds of children, to dispel the beautiful legend and illusion that surrounds our Christmas festival. Not to have the children believe in Santa Claus robs them of one of the brightest dreams in life. There is a world of sunlight and little shadow in the childish belief of this legend. The little ones look forward to the coming of this great benefactor with all-absorbing interest, and even the plotting of mischief is for the nonce dispelled from their busy brains by the glorious anticipation of his annual visit; and in after years these early fancies form a beautiful retrospect of the past. While the pleasing anticipations of youth gild the future, their recollections ornament bygone years. Let childhood have its happy beliefs undisturbed by the thought or idea of the unreal; to destroy their faith in Santa Claus would be akin to shaking their faith in the Savior of Man. We may become practical and matter-of-fact as we advance in years, but we deceive ourselves when we think there is no vestige of superstition remaining in us. We all have our day dreams, and, disguise it as we will, there will constantly crop out our fancy that there is some invisible power that controls our acts. In this we are merely grown-up children. Our after lives are as much made up of the ideal as the real, but we are too stubborn to admit it. The childish fancy may be a source of amusement to us in after years, but who among us has not the feeling that our destiny is often in the infinite, and that some spirit guides us to good or evil? If we are not too proud to acknowledge it, most of us will say that we still possess those fancies we enjoyed in our childhood, but on a different plane of operations. These pretty beliefs are the roses that conceal the thorns, the ivy that clings round the cottage. Without our fancies in childhood and old age life would be bereft of its greatest beauties. We live by our imaginations, by our admirations, by our sentiments. Life itself is a succession of dreams. Emerson has put it thus: "There is no chance and no anarchy in the universe. All is system and gradation. Every god is sitting there in his sphere." We cannot escape our superstitions, no matter how practical or matter-of-fact we may seem. The Greek tragedy expressed this idea: "Whatever is fated, that will take place. The great, immense mind of Jove is not to be transgressed." There is a feeling in every man that his actions and fate are controlled by some invisible and incomprehensible power. The illusions of childhood will in time give way to this graver fancy; and who among us would seek to expedite the change from the happier to the sterner condition. Keep up the legend of Santa Claus in your home circle just as long as a single member of it will yield to the innocent deception.

The editor of the Courier-Journal must have been a victim of the prevailing epidemic "la grippe," judging from the following description of the delightful torments the sufferer undergoes:

In the first place, when it came out of the forests and steppes lying beyond the Volga and the Dnieper and other Muscovite rivers, where it may have had an abiding place for centuries untold in the tent of the Cossack, brought in from farthest Asia on the skirts of the Tartar hordes that followed in the trail of the Great Khan and his descendants, it was known as the Russian influenza. Then when it reached Paris, and strode up and down the Avenue des Italiens, and the Champs Elysees, and through the Bois de Boulogne, falling upon the population of the country round about, as the Assyrian came down on the fold, it was honored with the title of la grippe, and as such made itself a recognized factor in the life of western Europe. Finally it crossed the Atlantic, and becoming a familiar visitor in every American household, its name was changed, according to the Yankee idea of brevity and expressiveness, into the short and pat grip. Grip it is, and grip it will remain. We have it, and by "we" everybody is meant. For a long time the existence of such a thing was doubted. Some people were incredulous, and talked about bad colds, exaggeration, imagination, gullibility, and other things which are supposed to account for freaks of nature, but the grip has demonstrated the possession of vitality, originality and life of its own which stamp it as an individual existence altogether different from predecessors or contemporaries, and entitled to a separate place in medical encyclopedias. It has its own set of microbes, a distinctive password, peculiar methods of treating its victims, and has fairly won recognition and position in the nineteenth century.

The symptoms are the same in every case. There is an aching of all the bones. The head grows dull and heavy and swims around and around. The spinal cord gets out of place. The eyes become bleared and dim. The mouth is dry and sour. The nose requires constant attention. The throat is sore, and the coughs pulled up through it, from the contracted and painful chest, carry pieces of membrane with them. The voice is hoarse and weak. The muscles become flabby and lose their power, and the hands are dry and swollen. The victim is unable to sleep. He tumbles around all night and says the multiplication table over and over, and swears and wonders how long it is until day. He cannot eat. The things which used to tempt him do not tempt him now. The butter is strong, the coffee is weak, the bread is sour, the steak is tough, the soup has gone wrong, and the dessert is a drug. The joy and flavor have gone out of life. He cannot read. He picks up his newspaper, and the letters do a can-can and a Highland fling before his bleared vision. The pictures are upside down, and the advertisements run away. He turns to his books, but every author has lost his charm; poetry and prose mixed up in a chaotic fashion and are alike senseless. He does not care for the theater. The actors cannot act, and the singers cannot sing. His business may care for itself. He takes no interest in it. Crops, and factories, and railroads, and merchants are nothing to him, for the whole world has gone wrong.

But one consolation is left for the sufferer, though that is by no means insignificant. Everybody else has it. His pet enemy writhes in its clutches, and, most consoling of all, his intimate friend is a victim. Thus, all the world is blowing its nose and holding its aching head, and wondering how long this thing will last, for it is a taste of torment to have the Grip.

Andrew Lang has been praised so much that it is evident from his later writings, he has become afflicted with an "enlarged head." No one who has read his valuable criticisms generally, will gainsay that he is a fine writer and an excellent critic. But too much flattery has made him arrogant and presumptuous. While he has given the literary world some clever reviews of Shakspeare's plays, he detracts from his own merits by the assumption of suggested improvements on the originals. The climax of assurance is reached, however, when he questions Byrons poetic genius. Mr. Lang declares, with a show of learning, that "later generations than ours must give Byron his place among poets." When this critic, himself an Englishman, decries the muse of Byron, he writes himself an ass. There never has been a poet, ancient or modern, that possessed the true spirit of the muse to a greater extent than the author of "Childe Harold," "The Corsair," "Don Juan" and the many gems that were the creations of his poetic fancy. With Byron there appears no labor with his muse. The inspired thoughts flow with the ease and grace of the mountain stream. Every line is an inspiration. There is none of the "digging" or "blasting" process, so comically mentioned by Mark Twain in his discription of an early mining poet. We think it is indeed heresy for Mr. Lang, the countryman of Byron, to give utterance to these sentiments: "His poetical position, at this moment, in public opinion is hard to determine. Is 'Childe Harold' much read? Do many persons delight in 'The Siege of Corinth' and 'Laura,' and all the gloomy, weary unprincipled corsairs of his fancy? Or is it only 'Don Juan' and a few lyrics that survive? In Byron are we not rather admiring the amazing vitality, the spirit like a flame, than any poetic results which that great force ever accomplished? Later generations than ours must give Byron his place among poets; we are still uncertain, still partly dominated by the personal qualities which, more than his poetry, really made him, for his hour, the monarch of Parnassus. For one, I believe that most people who write verse at all decently could have written a more adequate 'Storming of Corinth.' " Goldsmith once took it in his head to severely criticize the style and metaphor of Shakspeare, and in one of his brilliant essays literally tore the famous soliloquy of Hamlet into tatters, metaphorically speaking. The great monuments to genius still remain, however, despite the critics' shafts. When Andrew Lang, clever as he is, attempts to improve on Shakspeare or Byron, he makes himself an object of ridicule rather than a true friend of literary merit. Too much adulation has made Lang "mad, bad and dangerous to know," as was written of Byron himself by Lady Caroline Lamb.

The Hon. George M. Radcliffe, brother of Frank C. Radcliffe, cashier of the Sacramento Bee, died at Merced last Sunday morning after a brief illness. Although the deceased had only been in California about four years, he had formed a large circle of warm acquaintances. Before coming to the Pacific coast, he was a resident of Illinois, where he had been for many years one of the leaders of the Republican party. During his residence in that state, he was an intimate friend and associate of General Logan, Colonel Ingersoll, "Dick" Yates, Abraham Lincoln and other distinguished men. He was a member of both the conventions which nominated "Uncle Abe" for the presidency, and also of the one which selected General Garfield, who was Mr. Radcliffe's intimate friend. George M. Radcliffe was one of the veteran journalists of Illinois. He was a most vigorous, yet a polished, writer, and his editorials, particularly those of a political nature, did much to advance the interests of the party with which he was associated, and which called closely around him the noted Republican leaders of the country. For a number of years he held the office of internal revenue assessor for the northern district of Illinois, having received the appointment from General Grant. Besides being a graceful writer, Mr. Radcliffe was an orator of ability and eloquence. He was often heard on the "stump," on the lecture platform and in the pulpit, having been a minister of the Christian church. A short time before he came west he was offered the position of chief editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, one of the most influential newspapers in the country. During his residence on this coast he has written much for the press, particularly for the Merced Daily Sun, of which one of his sons, C. D. Radcliffe, is one of the proprietors. Deceased was a native of Ohio, aged 63 years.

A Russian Novelist On the Effects of Alcohol.

People explain their use of stimulants and narcotics, such as brandy, wine, beer, tobacco, hashish, opium, morphia, ether, etc., by saying: It is pleasant; everyone drinks; it keeps up the spirits; or: To drive away melancholy; it is universal; everybody smokes, etc. But it must be very evident that the man, who, placed by circumstances or his own acts, in a position that forces him to choose between the infliction of hardship and misery upon the family that is dear to him, on the one hand, and absence from stupefying stimulants and narcotics on the other, chooses the former alternative, is impelled to the choice by something far more potent than the desire to keep up his spirits, or the speculative considerations that everyone else does the same.

The real reason for the extensive use of these stimulants and narcotics is that they stupefy and deaden the conscience, and conceal from one's self its records.

A sober man scruples to do that which a drunken man will execute without hesitation. People enjoy stimulants and narcotics either for the purpose of stifling remorse after having performed an action disapproved of by their conscience, or else in order to induce a state of mind in which they shall be capable of doing something contrary to the dictates of their conscience, and to which the animal nature of man is impelling him.

A sober man has conscientious scruples about stealing or committing murder. A drunken man, on the contrary, is troubled with no such scruples. Hence it is, if a person wishes to do something which his conscience forbids, he first stupefies his faculties. The courage inspired by drink is responsible for nine-tenths of the total number of crimes that stain humanity.

It is well known that alcohol deadens the voice of conscience, and people deliberately make use of it for this purpose.—Count Tolstoi.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Act tresses—Blonde wigs.

All the world's a stage, and it's full of bad actors.

Fashion makes comedies at which no one dares to laugh.

The richer a man becomes the more anxious he is to see a show for nothing.

La Dame de Chantant, the play in which Sarah Bernhardt recently appeared in New York, is nasty enough to enjoy a long run in the United States.

Judge Crisp's father and mother were members of a Savannah dramatic company in the days before the war, and the future speaker, then a youth, sometimes appeared on the stage in minor roles.

Edward Harrigan has completed a play to take the place of Reilly and the 400. It is named The Last of the Haggans, and in it the author will be seen as Judge McKeever, a frolicsome Irishman. Ada Lewis will illustrate another kind of Tough Girl and Dave Braham will provide six new songs for the piece.

Adah Isaacs Menken, the dazzling footlight favorite of a generation ago, sleeps in a weed-grown grave in the Paris cemetery of Pere-la-Chaise. Outside of an occasional curious tourist few people visit her last resting-place, but her fate in this respect is hardly different from that of many others of her kind who people that wonderful city of the dead.

For Money is Crane's new play. As a matter of fact Crane cares little for anything else than for money. There was a time when our California people thought well of Crane, and indeed it was here he gained his reputation. His subsequent abuse of our people because they would not bring their sacks and lay them at his feet, has lowered him in our estimation. For Money is his deity these days.

Manager Charles Froham has about as many enterprises under his watchful eye as falls to the lot of any clever theatrical manager. They include Miss Helyett, two Wilkinson's Widows companies, Jane, two Shenadoah companies, Men and Women, The Lost Paradise, Henry Dixey, Thermidor, two All the Comforts of Home companies, Held by the Enemy, The Solicitor and The Junior Partner.

King Oscar, of Sweden, is a man of wide culture, and adds music to his other accomplishments. "Never shall I forget," writes the Marquise de Fontenoy, "the exquisite melody which pealed forth from the organ loft of an old Norwegian church of the fourteenth century, situated in the grounds of the country seat of the King near Christiania. He sat up there and played to us for almost a full hour, after which he took us to a quaint old peasant cottage, such as they have up in the wilds of Telemarken, and treated us to a typical Norwegian peasant repast."

Carl Ahrendt, now with Thomas W. Keene, tells a good story illustrative of Booth's kindness in this respect. On one occasion he was playing Joseph to his Richelieu, and in the first act forgot a cue which called out a speech from Richelieu which invariably evokes hearty rounds of applause. Turning his back to the audience, Mr. Booth threw him that needed cue in an undertone. Then Ahrendt gave it, and Richelieu made his point. When they got behind the scenes Ahrendt apologized, saying: "Mr. Booth, I am very sorry. I can't for the life of me explain how I came to forget that cue." "I can," was the tragedian's rejoinder. "The fault was mainly mine. Don't you remember I skipped a couple of speeches, and carried you by, as it were? Don't worry about it. It's all right now." Those who saw Mr. Booth at Billy Florence's funeral breathed many a secret prayer that he might long be spared, "the Emperor of the stage," as Father Brann fitly termed him.

She came smiling down the stage to receive a huge floral offering that was lifted over the footlights. The house rang with plaudits and bravos, for she was the petted idol of the hour. Her gowns were copied by all the fashionable world; her photographs adorned the shop windows; her equipages were the finest in the park. Life was very sweet to her, for it had given to her all that the heart of woman longs for—beauty, fame, fine raiment, priceless jewels, and the homage of men. This moment of triumph was but one of many. She half closed her eyes before the storm of applause, and bent her beautiful golden head above the basket of superb roses before her. Her eye caught a white card tied to the basket. A perceptible shudder passed through her form. Her lips set themselves for a moment, and a certain haughty constraint seemed to change the poise of her dainty head and the smile upon her beautiful lips, and as the curtain fell, she turned and left the blossoms untouched. She had seen her manager's name on the card, and she knew the price would be deducted from her salary.—Dramatic Mirror.

In the inner circles of theatrical life there is being told just now a most excellent story of James T. Powers, the hero of A Straight Tip. In passing through Philadelphia to Washington this season Mr. Powers stayed over Sunday in the Quaker city to witness a dress rehearsal of Pauline Hall's company in Madame Favart. In Miss Hall's company is a young lady for whom Mr. Powers is understood to have a high regard. He is one of the most gallant of men, and when rehearsal was over at 2 A. M., and the young lady complained of hunger, Mr. Powers vowed he would find her supper if he had to search all over Philadelphia. She said she would wait for it in her room at the Continental hotel. Mr. Powers finally found a restaurant open and ordered a dainty and elaborate lunch with a true lover's reckless disregard of expense. Then he retired content. Miss Hall was also at the Continental, and the number of her room orally resembled that of the young lady's room as fourteen resembles forty. The next morning Mr. Powers, just about to go to the train for Washington, and still felicitating himself upon the gratitude he must have inspired in the young lady's heart through his luncheon, found the following note in his box at his hotel:

MY DEAR MR. POWERS—Many thanks for your graceful attention last night. I was exceedingly hungry after the rehearsal, and as the dining-room was closed, I don't know what I should have done had it not been for your thoughtfulness in sending me that delicious luncheon. Yours, gratefully, PAULINE HALL.

History goes on to say that Mr. Powers was so mad that night that he had to say his gags through clenched teeth.

Book Chat.

This is the season when people who ought to know better are buying books for the sake of their bindings.

Jerome K. Jerome, the ex actor and present dramatist, is to run a paper called the Idler. Mark Twain is writing for it.

Somebody says that poets are declining. This may be so, but you had better not ask a poet what he will take, on the strength of it.

Gen. Wolseley, a London correspondent reports, "is believed to be trying his hand at a romance." Granting that his war papers have been free from that quality, Sir Garnet is no tyro in the field of romance; he published a two volume novel fourteen or fifteen years ago.

A German paper quotes passages from an old book by one Hebrew who strove to relieve the Jews from the responsibility for the crucifixion. The author argued that the executioners of the Messiah were the body guard of Pilate, which consisted of Teutons. The book is entitled, "Proof that Those Who Crucified Christ were Westphalians."

Edgar Fawcett has written a new novel, "A Romance of Two Brothers." The great sensation of this story of prolific deaths is the "liquefied electricity," which serves to bring the dead to life again. The husband becomes ill and uses this, his own discovery, for relief. His wife thinks it is against the decrees of God to interfere with the course of nature, and therefore breaks the flask containing the liquefied electricity and lets her husband die. This couple had two sons. One of these had a red-headed wife, who became wearied of life and drowned herself. The other son did not know his brother's wife, but by the use of a flask of this liquefied electricity, the recipe for which he obtained from his father, restored the red-headed wife of his brother to life. The shock of drowning had bereft her of reason, yet the brother had determined to marry this beauty. Just at this point the other brother, the husband, appears, and his wife seeing him, her reason returned, and she promptly dies a second time. From this it would appear that, if the brother had not appeared, he would have married his sister-in-law. Before the liquefied electricity can be administered again, the flask is accidentally broken; the recipe is lost and there is no chance to revive the dead characters of the story.

The Germans are justly proud of the richness of their language, their well-conjoined and artfully compounded words, and the beauty of their nouns formed of adjectives. They take a peculiar delight in the long, many-syllabled single substantive, in which is fused such wealth of meanings that they boastfully declare that it would require a long sentence of the English language to convey it properly. Yet it was with a wistful little sigh that a German lady confessed that her mother tongue held no such beautiful and expressive compound as "lady-like." "It means so much," said she, enviously, "and is so musical and suggestive."

Heaps of huge words uphoarded hideously.
With horrid sound, through having little sense,
They think to be chief praise of poetry;
And thereby, wanting due intelligence,
Have marr'd the face of goodly poesie,
And made a monster of their fantasie.

So wrote Spenser in the sixteenth century. The pity of it is, that it is as true to-day. What should be the "goodly poesie" in current magazine literature, were the same high standard maintained as govern other departments of our magazines, is made up of "heaps of huge words," and all the rest of it that goes to make the monster of the poetaster's fantasy.

Lord Rosebery's "Life of Pitt," published in London a few days ago, is being much talked of and written about. The liberal papers all praise; the conservatives all pick flaws in it. When he went into the house of commons, writes Lord Rosebery of Pitt, as an heir enters his home, he breathed in it his native atmosphere—he had, indeed, breathed no other; in the nursery, in the school-room, at the university, he lived in its temperature; it had been, so to speak, made over to him as a bequest by its unquestioned master. Throughout his life, from the cradle to the grave, he may be said to have known no wider existence. The objects and amusements that other men seek in a thousand ways were for him all concentrated there. It was his mistress, his stud, his dice-box, his game preserve; it was his ambition, his library, his creed. For it, and it alone, had the consummate Chatham trained him from his birth. No young Hannibal was ever more solemnly devoted to his country than Pitt to parliament. In treating of Pitt as an orator Lord Rosebery says: Unfriendly critics said that his voice sounded as if he had worsted in his mouth, but the general testimony is that it was rich and sonorous. Fox never used notes, and Pitt rarely. A specimen of these is given by Lord Stanhope. His eloquence must have greatly resembled that with which Mr. Gladstone has fascinated two generations, not merely in pellucid and sparkling statement, but in those rolling and interminable sentences which come thundering in mighty succession, like the Atlantic waves on the Biscayan coast—sentences which other men have "neither the understanding to form nor the vigor to utter."

A Rival of the "Old Dominion."

Ohio has furnished three presidents—William Henry Harrison, Rutherford B. Hayes and James A. Garfield; President Grant was also born in Ohio.

One acting vice-president—Benjamin F. Wade.

One speaker of the house—J. Warran Keifer.

Five secretaries of the treasury—Thomas Ewing, Thomas Corwin, Salmon P. Chase, John Sherman and Charles Foster. Two secretaries of war—Edwin M. Stanton and Alphonso Taft.

Three secretaries of the interior—Thomas Ewing, Jacob D. Cox and Columbus Delano.

Three postmasters general—Return J. Meigs, Jr., John McLean and Wm. Dennison, Jr.

Three attorneys general—Edwin M. Stanton, Henry Stanberry and Alphonso Taft.

Two chief justices of the supreme court—Salmon P. Chase and Morrison R. Waite.

Three associate justices of the supreme court—John McLean, Noah H. Swayne and Stanley Matthews.

Without mentioning the whole list of military officers which Ohio has furnished the republic, it is enough to recall the proud claim that Grant, Sherman and Sheridan were born in Ohio. This record of Ohio in the national government is brilliant and challenges comparison with any other state in the union.

"Prisoner," said Judge Cowing, "you are charged with gambling." "Gambling! What is gambling?" "Playing cards for money." "But I did not play cards for money; I played cards for chips." "Well, you got money for your chips at the end of the game, didn't you?" "No; I didn't have any chips at the end of the game." "You are discharged."

Eugenie's small and elegant foot, once the admiration of the French court, has now, it is said, become swollen out of shape by gout and rheumatism. The foot, in the days of its fame, was so Cinderella-like in its thinness that its discarded shoes could be worn only by children, for there was no woman in all Eugenie's train whose foot was small enough to fit them.

Deeply interested as was Dom Pedro in scientific matters, it appears that he once fell asleep at a meeting of savants. He was making a tour through Italy and had become very weary when the hour for this gathering came. To the earlier proceedings he gave close heed; but, after he had dozed off, the lecturer, not discovering the situation, ventured upon a eulogy of the distinguished auditor. Thereupon the audience loudly applauded. Dom Pedro woke, and, supposing the demonstration to have been called forth by some utterance upon a scientific question, began to clap his hands with an air of conviction.

Here's good advice in condensed form: "Journalist, have you an article to prepare? Make it short. Minister, have you a sermon to preach? Make it short. Lawyer, have you an argument to present? Make it short. Funny man, have you a joke to tell? Make it short. Ladies, have you pie crust or dresses to make? Make 'em short. Tailor, have you a coat to build? Make it short. Saloonist, do you keep a slate? Keep it short. Young man, have you a marriage engagement on hand? Make it short. Obituary writers and presidents, make your messages short. It is not necessary to advise bank cashiers as to their accounts. They are sure to make them short anyhow."

Modern elocution is a kind of acting, and I have known very few actors who were even tolerably good speechmakers. The majority of barristers "act more or less in court, and they rarely speak eloquently either after dinner or in parliament. The ancient orators must have had some advantages of which we are all deprived. Perhaps Cicero sang his speeches and Demosthenes danced. You know that he recommended "action, action, and yet more action." But action is not acting. To speak really well you must believe in that which you are saying. Who is more eloquent than an angry woman? On the other hand, I do most firmly believe in what is coarsely but impressively termed "the gift of the gab"—that is to say, that eloquence is a boon of nature. Charles Dickens had it. Next to the late Lord Derby and John Bright, the author of "David Copperfield" was one of the finest public speakers I have ever listened to. Mr. Thackeray was one of the wretchedest.—Geo. A. Sala.

The Wandering Jew.

There are many legends of the Wandering Jew. The old Jewish story is that Cartaphilos, the book-keeper of the Judgment Hall, under the employ of Pontius Pilate, struck our Lord as he was led from the hall, saying: "Go faster! Get on!" Jesus turned to him and said: "I go, but you tarry until I come again." Cursed though he was, he afterwards became a Christian, and was baptized. In tradition he still lives, falling into a protracted trance every thirty years. Another legend tells us that Jesus, almost overcome by the weight of the cross as he was carrying it to the place of execution, stopped before the shop of a cobbler and rested his hand against the wall of the building. This enraged the cobbler, whose name was Ahasuerus, to such an extent that he threw a last at the Man of Sorrows, crying to him, "Get off! Away with you!" Jesus rebuked him, saying: "I go and go quickly, but command thee to wander over the earth until the judgment day." This last legend is the one given by Paul von Eitzen, Bishop of Schleswig, in the year 1547.

A third legend says that Ahasuerus had been detailed to bring Jesus into the Judgment Hall of Pilate, and that he was rushing our Lord along at a swift gait when Jesus complained of weariness and requested to sit down on a stone by the wayside. This request was refused by the heartless wretch, who exclaimed: "Move on, Jesus, move on! Thou shalt not rest." Jesus replied: "I go my way unto everlasting rest; but thou shalt go away and never rest until I return to earth again."

In Germany the Wandering Jew is associated with the story of one John Buttadaeus, who is said to have appeared in Antwerp in the thirteenth, fifteenth and seventeenth centuries. This spectre, vision, ghost or impostor last appeared at Brussels in 1773.

In the French legend the Wandering Jew is known by the name of Isaac Lakedion.

The main character in the legend of the "Wild Huntsman" of England, the one whom Shakspeare mentions as Herne the Hunter, is said to be a Jew who refused to let Jesus drink from a horse-trough.

January 1, 1644, a person claiming to be the original Wandering Jew appeared in Paris. He said that his name was Michob Ader, and that he had been usher of the Judgment Hall at Jerusalem in the time of Jesus and Pilate, and that for thrusting Christ from the hall he had been condemned to live and wander over the earth forever.

NOTES.

Some of our people when they bestow a little charity—cast a crust on the water—expect to find a whole bakery a short distance away for their return.

Wall street, New York, derives its name from the old Wall family, and Lombard street in London was so named because the Lombards, of Paris, were the first European bankers.

A forcible example of the necessity of observing accent and punctuation in reading, was afforded by the careless reader who gave the passage from the bible, with the following pauses: "And the old man said unto his sons, 'Saddle me, the ass,' and they saddled him!"

Every bride at all superstitious is careful to wear something blue on her wedding day. This, no doubt, arises from the old time maxim, which demands that the toilet worn upon the auspicious occasion shall be "something old, something new, something borrowed, and something blue." Failing to obey this command the bride is sure to have the worst of bad luck.

On Tuesday our contemporary, the Evening News, became one year old, and it turned the first mile-post with every manifestation of prosperity. It is not expected that anyone except the manager will be content with the conduct of any journal; and while at times we have felt that our contemporary has been mistaken in judgment, we are conscious we have, in common with newspapers generally, failed always to please everybody. The News has a merit which daily journals, as a rule, do not have: it boils down the news in narrow compass. This may seem a saving of editorial labor; it is not. Much easier it is to edit the blanket sheets of to-day with a shears than to carefully sift out the wheat and cast aside the chaff.

A farmer in Missouri has a half-gallon jar of peach preserves that have kept in perfect condition for more than thirty years. They were recently tested and found to have retained their flavor as well as their looks. Capt. Wm. M. Siddons can beat that showing. He has two jars of brandy peaches put up in 1858, and the peaches retain their original appearance. They are larger than a base ball, and even their original color is preserved. These splendid peaches came from Coloma, from which place the very finest fruit came, even in those early days. It will be indeed a treat to sample these peaches when the "Captain" determines to open the jars. Just think of that brandy, which was twelve years old when he put it in those jars—now forty-five years old.

As usual, there is a woman at the bottom of it. We refer to the Chinese uprising. It appears that the wife of a distinguished bandit and marauder was abducted from her husband, and the present trouble grows out of an attempt to recapture her. Chinese advices fail to state in whose interest the bandit's wife was abducted; but as the wronged husband is leading his forces against the empire and endeavoring to crawl over the great wall, we infer that Kuang Hsu, the emperor, is at least suspected. When Paris carried off Helen, and her husband and friends revolted, the matter was pool-pooled by Paris and his father; but, according to best accounts, they lived to regret it. The skirmish which followed lasted throughout ten long and bloody years, and resulted in the complete overthrow of the abductors. While there is much fiction about this Trojan war, there is still another basis for the story to make it a disagreeable precedent for the emperor of China to contemplate. If he has any information regarding the whereabouts of the distinguished bandit's wife, or can obtain the information, it would undoubtedly be well for him to have her returned without delay. A war with a woman in it is always to be avoided.

[CONTRIBUTED.]

How Wells Died.

Many and varied have been the theories that have been indulged and advanced as to the final chapter of the horrid and bloody tragedy that was enacted just outside of Sacramento city, near what was then Bannon's slough, in the year 1860, when one Wells killed three men who had him under arrest and were escorting him from the territory of Nevada to this city to answer to a charge of murder, he having killed a sick man he had been employed to nurse. After disposing of his sick and helpless patient and robbing him of his money and jewelry, quite an amount in value, Wells made his way to the soils of Washoe valley; and it was while attempting to dispose of some of the stolen property, that the officers were enabled to detect and arrest him, for the telegraph had been made use of in sending accounts of the tragedy and a particular description of the murderer to every point on the Pacific coast. A constable started to California with him and progressed safely till about Nicolaus, this side of Marysville. It will be borne in memory that all travel in California at that period was done by stage. The outgoing stage from Sacramento met that from Nevada, containing Wells and his solitary guard, at the station near Nicolaus. The driver of the outgoing stage inquired if the other had Wells aboard, and being answered in the affirmative, cautioned the officer to be careful when he got in the vicinity of Sacramento, as there was a mob there ready to deal with the murderer. It was then that the constable determined on employing a wagon and team, that he might the more readily avoid the populace by shunning the usually traveled road, and, by pursuing circuitous roads, deliver his prisoner safely into the hands of the officers of the law. The idea was a good one, but the escort fell into the fatal error of confiding too much in the now thoroughly frightened fugitive. Two additional men were enlisted to assist the Nevada officer in the remainder of his journey. All progressed without note till the neighborhood of Bannon's slough, just across the American river, was approached, when one of the guards carelessly stretched himself on the bottom of the wagon and was soon sound asleep. It was the constable from the territory; poor fellow! nights and days of sleepless watch and anxiety had rendered him an easy victim to the first opportunity to snatch a brief moment of rest in slumber, though it was in a rough wagon, over rougher roads. It was fated to be his last, long, eternal sleep. The human hyena on the seat, apparently securely ironed, was not asleep; neither was he sleepy; for all the vital energy of his inhuman nature was alert for any chance for his already condemned life. At Sacramento a wild, maddened populace, with noose in ready hands, feverishly awaited his coming, to welcome him with short shrift. Even though he was securely landed in a strong jail by his guard and thus escaped the fury of the mob, still it was but a temporary reprieve, for the law courts must very little later mete out to him that fate that to him would be the same had the frenzied and baffled citizens been gratified in their anxiety, save only the one would have been garnished with legal approbation.

Hence the felon, now at bay, and in silent fury, chafed for any moment of which he might take advantage, be it ever so desperate, seize it he would and let the future care for itself. The two men in front of him, one driving and both careless, seemed oblivious of the presence of the desperado who sat behind them, and of the fact that an armed officer slept soundly in the bed of the wagon, his weapons within easy reach of the prisoner. Dark was fast shutting out the day; the willow thicket grew more dense as the river was approached; with the stealth of the crouching panther Wells was enabled to extract one of the slumbering man's heavy Colt's pistol from its holster, and it was but the work of a second to stretch in death the two men in the front seat with a half ounce of lead in the brain of each. The sleeper attempted to arouse himself because of the commotion, but another pull of the trigger and Wells was master of the situation. He, of course, left the wagon and its load of dead, and took to the brush. The history of the way in which the news was conveyed to the city; the wild excitement with which it was received; the ringing of the alarm bell; the arming of men and their hurrying in every direction, armed to the teeth, each man sworn to himself to "kill on sight" this four-times murderer. All this has been related and written. But who, of all who have treated the subject, has yet satisfactorily accounted for the fate of Wells? Not one. The mystery of his final end; the destiny that overtook him; whether he died the death of the despairing, despondent suicide, or made his escape from the state, and found his way to another country, where he may yet be living, are all as mysterious as if buried in the tomb of Lazarus.

But among the many conjectures as to his fate, or rather among the many stories that have been related about the way in which Wells was disposed of, was the one given in a local paper last week, and written by a man named Boynton. After detailing the history of the crime, this latest historian of the "life and times of Wells," proceeds to say:

"While the overland telegraph was being built across Nevada Mr. Hubbard, of Sacramento, had a contract upon a portion of the work. One day a man came to his camp and requested work. He was set to work digging post holes. A few days later two men rode up and cried, 'Hello, Wells; when did you get over into Nevada?' He suddenly drew and presented a pistol, saying at the same time, 'I want none of your jokes here. Ride on at once.' They galloped to the camp and related the circumstance, and learned there for the first time of the murders that had been committed. Prior to this the men with whom he had been working were ignorant that the man was Wells, the murderer. Instant preparations were made to capture the man, but he had hidden himself so effectually that he could not be found. That night, however, the best riding horse owned by Mr. Hubbard was stolen, and it was thought that the thief must have been Wells, the murderer. He was pursued but not captured."

Here it may be asked: Is it possible that one man was set alone to dig telegraph-post holes, and at such a distance from camp that two horsemen could have had such an interview with him without the knowledge of any of the other "hands" at work? Again, is it possible that Wells was armed with a pistol while at work so that he could have suddenly drawn and presented, as Mr. Boynton says he did? And it must be consistently supposed that horsemen in the territory of Nevada went armed as well as telegraph post-hole diggers. It seems to me that part of the history will not wash—it is too thin and tears easily.

Mr. Boynton has Wells killed in this mock-heroic way:

"The death of this man was in keeping with the life he had led. In the summer of 1864 a party were traveling near Fort Colville, in Washington Territory. One day the men accidentally learned that in the party was this man Wells. They traveled on till night without making any attempt to secure him, but it is thought that the men meant to give him into the custody of the soldiers at the fort. A lad of fourteen, on learning who the man was and of the crimes that he had committed, could not restrain himself, and, when they dismounted at night, he ran, seized a gun, and shot the murderer dead. The body of the assassin was buried in a little ravine between Fort Colville and Pinkney, while the boy was placed in the hands of the officers of the fort. The following night, acting upon the suggestion of the soldiers who had been sent to guard him, the lad escaped, and nothing is known of his subsequent life."

Why did this fourteen-year-old lad want to kill Wells? Is it not more probable that he would have set about giving the men the benefit of his discovery that Wells was among them, and thus enable them to gain the large reward offered by arresting the outlaw? Yes, it appears that the boy's connection with the death is at least questionable. But now to another theory as to the termination of Wells' disappearance:

It will be remembered that when the rewards were offered for his arrest there were any number of men taken in different counties in this and other states and many territories, and notice of such arrests sent by every mail to the sheriff and other officers of this county, and photographs accompanying the notices, till the mails were at times almost exclusively devoted to matters relating to Wells and his supposed arrest. One especial case of mistaken identity attracted widespread attention and elicited universal sympathy because of the entire absence of any probable cause for his arrest, and the fact of his respectability and the honorable position occupied by his family. This man was arrested in Oregon, and after being brought to this city, and being at once discharged, the Legislature, which was then in session, if I am not in error, voted the unfortunate man a sum of money as a poor compensation for the position in which he had been placed by the over-zealous but misguided officers.

It was in this connection and about that time that what purported to be "the only genuine" account of Wells' death was given by one who had personal knowledge of all the criminal cases that were enacted in Sacramento or had been for years. He was a leading criminal lawyer of his day, and was, in after years, a sharp, aggressive, competent district attorney. It was James C. Goods. Shortly after the release of the suspected party who had been brought down from Oregon, Goods, with a party of friends, was one day in the saloon kept by Kelly & O'Toole on J street, near Fourth, now occupied by Isadore Cohen as a cigar store. The conversation was on the subject of Wells' disappearance and the many arrests that had been made of men thought to resemble him, particularly of the Oregon man, for no two or more men could in those days stop to talk a moment before that theme was introduced. Goods produced a photograph of the Oregonian, and, after scanning it closely, denounced his arrest as an outrage, for as he said, there was not a possible resemblance between it and those of Wells that had been sent abroad to flood the country. Goods had known Wells, as the latter had served a long sentence in the county jail for stealing turkeys the winter before the murder. Goods then told his hearers that very few knew how Wells had been disposed of, but that he (Goods) was cognizant of the fact, of which there could be no doubt, and as the parties to the business were all dead, he had no hesitation in revealing the facts, and they were as follows:

For several nights after Wells killed the men who had him in charge, he hid in the brush on the outskirts of the city, living as best he could on the provisions he was able to steal in the neighborhood. Despair, desperation, starvation confronting him; hunted like a blood-dripping wild beast; his lair surrounded by armed men ready to drop him in his tracks by a bullet should he show his head; every stump and stone concealing an officer; every alley guarded by a detective; what was the hunted wretch to do, where to look for that aid in food and flight then so needful for his safety? Desperation seized him and he resolved on heroic measures. One dark night, at the dead hour when, the poet tells us, "church-yards yawn," and when all save the watchman of the city were in slumber, quietly leaving his place of concealment in the dense willow thicket near where the north or B-street levee now is, Wells stole along unfrequented streets and through alleys until he reached the front door of a then well-known and popular policeman; one who had made a name for himself by ferreting out high crime and running to earth just such felons as this who stood on the threshold of his door. Gently rapping, so as not to arouse the neighbors, it was not hard to awake the officer, who was accustomed to be called at any hour by his superiors to assume the lead in desperate enterprises. Quickly going to the door, dressed but in his night-robe, what was his horror to find himself face to face with the man for whose capture the state was in arms! When the officer could collect his senses he was only able to ask, with bated breath, that the family might not overhear, "what do you want here?"

Wells, with his courage born of desperation, replied in like quiet but determined tone, "—, you know what I know about you; I am desperate, I am ready for anything; my life is not worth a moment's time if I should be discovered. I cannot live in the swamp any longer, and I must have money to get out of the country. You can and must give it to me, and I will leave here and no one will ever know anything of the facts. If you refuse you know what will be the result to you—San Quentin or a place by my side on the same gallows, for you know very well I have long had you in my power, and now I feel that the money with which you tied my tongue has not been enough, so if you give me enough to pay my way to some other country you are free to do what you want. If not, I'll go to the station house, give myself up and take my chances; but you must take yours, too."

This was all hurriedly spoken; at the end of which the startled policeman and detective, who was not to be thus baffled or cowed, ordered Wells to conceal himself in the shadow of the shrubbery in the yard and there await the return of the officer, who retired to dress himself. He bade his wife good night as he explained to her that the chief had sent for him to take up and follow a newly discovered clue in the Wells case. On joining Wells in the yard, the murderer impressed on the officer the necessity of acting squarely; if not, he would number him the fifth among his victims, as he was armed with one of the pistols taken from the officer whom he killed a few days previous.

It was agreed that the officer should go down town, procure the sum demanded by Wells, and then meet him at a given place in the brush. They both went to the spot, so there might be no mistake as to the locality. The officer then retired as if to carry out his promise, but in reality only under pretense, for he went but a few blocks distant to pass away about the time it would require him to go to the business part of the city and return. At the end of that time he kept his appointment and met Wells, but he was well armed, for when he dressed himself he had buckled on his six-shooter, and when he pretended to go after the money, he changed his pistol from its holster to his overcoat pocket. When they met, the two men held a conversation on many subjects, especially on the special one that had put the policeman into Wells' power. At a moment when the latter was off his guard and suspected nothing, the officer quickly thrust the muzzle of his pistol, which he had cocked in his pocket, to Wells' heart and fired. The fellow dropped stone dead at the feet of the man whose secret—one of blood it must have been—he held, and which was forever locked in death with the man who had been hunted for the murder of four men. The policeman quickly dragged the body deeper into the brush and weeds and there left it till he could more effectually conceal it. No one heard the report of the pistol, or if it was heard, it was only by those who would not dare venture out of hiding to ascertain the cause, lest they fall into the hands of officers and be arrested on suspicion; for then almost anyone was liable to be taken in and questioned, if found out at late and unseasonable hours of the night. The following night at a favorable hour the officer managed to dispose of the corpse, either by sinking it in the slough or the river; no one ever learned which it was.

Mr. Goods concluded his narrative by saying that Wells knew of an affair of blood in which that officer had participated, which, had it been divulged, would have been fatal to the officer; would, in all likelihood, have consigned him to the gallows—at least, to a life's imprisonment at San Quentin—did he not meet death at the hands of those who felt themselves grievously wronged by some person unknown, the officer never having been suspected; besides which he had been involved in affairs forbidden by the laws of the land when a certain murderer of this county escaped arrest and was pursued night and day without avail by the peace officers, this one among the others, and he was more than suspected of knowing more about the fugitive's movements than he was willing to admit, and that he had good cause not to desire his arrest, but rather that he would escape and thus destroy another piece of most important evidence against him, for next to Wells this other murderer was the most damaging witness with which the officer would have to deal did that sensational charge ever come to the surface. What it was Jim Goods would not say, but his manner and tone indicated that he was the custodian—perhaps the only one except the officer himself—of a crime that might have startled the world had it been exposed; of a dark deed involving woman's honor, man's loving confidence in an outraged and guilty wife, and, finally, of at least one if not more murders to conceal, if possible, a deed even worse in its far-reaching tendencies and future influences.

And there is every reason to believe that Wells' slayer is yet alive and in California, but a changed, wretched old man, eking out a pitiable existence far from the scenes and haunts that once knew and honored him as a brave though reckless and often inhuman police officer.

Cinderella's Slippers.

The origin of this nursery tale is sufficiently curious. About the year 1730 a French actor of equal talent and wealth, named Thevenard, in passing through the streets of Paris, observed upon a cobbler's stall the shoe of a female, which struck him by the remarkable smallness of its size. After admiring it for some time he returned to his house, but his thoughts reverted to the shoe with such intensity that he reappeared at the stall the next day, but the cobbler could give him no other clue to the owner than that it had been left in his absence for the purpose of being repaired.

Day after day did Thevenard return to his post to watch the reintegration of the slipper, which proceeded slowly, nor did the proprietor appear to claim it. Although he had completed the 60th year of his age, so extravagant became his passion for the unknown fair one that he became (were it possible for a Frenchman of that day to be so) melancholy and miserable.

His pain was, however, somewhat appeased by the appearance of the little foot itself, appertaining to a pretty and youthful girl in the humblest class of life; all distinctions were leveled at once by love; the actor sought the parents of the damsel, procured their consent to the match, and actually made her his wife.—London Globe.

The Antiquity of Geese.

There is much curious amusement to be had in tracing where the foodstuffs we use, and the domestic animals we eat or use, originally came from. Professor Max Muller, reasoning through his science of words, finds that the goose was domesticated very early, or at least some bird like it.

"Goose" in English, "gans" in German; dropping the g according to the laws of language, the word becomes "anser" in Latin, and correspondingly in Greek, with the aspirate that marks the Digamma was dropped, and so back to "ansa" in the Sanscrit. Our prehistoric Sanscrit ancestors of the Indian fable lands had geese. Professor Muller therefore concludes birds resembling them closely, though thousands of years the name has remained, varying only according to the known laws of the change of pronunciation, and probably the Thingston throughout behind the name. Such is the antiquity of geese.

The sea is the largest of all cemeteries, and its slumberers sleep without a monument. All other graveyards, in all lands, show some symbol of distinction between the great and small, the rich and the poor; but in that ocean-cemetery the king and the clown, the prince and the peasant are alike undistinguished. The same waves roll over all; the same requiem by the minstrelsy of the ocean is sung to their honor. Over their remains the same storm beats and the same sun shines; and there, unmarbled, the weak and the powerful, the plumed and the unadorned, will sleep on until awakened by the same trump, when the sea shall "give up its dead!"—Giles.

Historic Duelling Pistols.

Mr. Charles Van Brunt of Utica, N. Y., is said to be the possessor of the pair of duelling pistols which were used in the fatal duel between Burr and Hamilton. They are flintlocks. The pans and touch-holes are lined and bushed with gold, the barrels 16 inches long, with a caliber of 56, carrying a two-ounce ball. The stock runs to the muzzle and is bound with brass, beautifully engraved. The weapon that gave Hamilton his death wound has a slight file mark on the lower part of the stock. The make and finish of the locks could not be surpassed at the present time. In the box in which they are kept are a number of patches of white kid, to cover the bullets, and the agate flints are wrapped in wash-leather to hold them in the cock. The name of the maker, Mortimer, London, is on the locks. Burr got the pistols from an Irishman named Holahan, whom he defended on a charge of murder, and it is a tradition that they once belonged to Lord Norbury, the fighting chief justice of Ireland. They weigh over three pounds apiece.

Little Errors Into Which Maid and Madame Are Prone to Fall.

It is a mistake for a young lady to talk to a man as if she were wise and widely experienced in all the human emotions, frailties and faults.

It is a mistake for a woman (wife, mother, sister or sweetheart) to make plans for the disposal of all a man's spare hours and then expect him to enjoy himself.

It is a mistake for a woman to try to prove to men her great knowledge and superior intellect. They enjoy an intellectual woman when they discover her brightness themselves, but they do not like to have her force her brains and learning upon them.

But it is just as great a mistake to assume an air of insipidity and expect a man to think it charming.

It is the mistake of a lifetime to give a man any liberty which you would not want known and to expect him to keep the matter a secret.

It is the worst mistake of all for a woman to think she can make no mistake.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox in Ladies' Home Journal.

Rings Around Their Necks.

A strange custom among the Bayanzi, who live along the Upper Congo, has been described by explorers. Brass rings, sometimes weighing thirty pounds, are welded around the necks of the wives. At first the neck becomes raw by the chafing of the ring, but after a while it becomes calloused, although a woman has to hold the ring up frequently to get relief from the weight. The ring is never put around a woman's neck until she has attained her full development. The women are proud of the ornament, believing that it enhances their importance and beauty.

Could not a pledge be taken against the use of the superlative? Lovely and sweet and dear are strong enough for all purposes. What do we want with loveliest and sweetest and dearest? Why cannot the ladies tell the rector that his curate preached a good sermon. Where is the need of saying that it was the best they had ever heard? And where the criticism is of the unfavorable sort; say the sermon was bad, and have done with it. The man who hears the worst sermon will probably not survive to tell the tale.

It is better that joy should be spread over all the day in the form of strength, than that it should be concentrated into ecstasies, full of danger and followed by reaction.—Emerson.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A bold experiment was made with a drama and an audience lately at Palmer's Theater, New York. The purpose was to ascertain the effect of representing, bluntly and plainly, to an assemblage of well-mannered people things which, if real, those same people would not have seen or heard voluntarily. One of the female characters was habitually profane. Two of the men cursed roundly in outright blasphemy. Several phases of child-birth and malpractice were mentioned without reserve. The seduction of a girl was discussed freely. A young mother unbuttoned her dress from neck to waist and began to unlatch her corset, preparatory to giving nourishment to an infant, when the curtain fell in time to avert a stampede of panic-stricken woman from the theater. The parts of the performance here indicated were grossly offensive. Nevertheless the play has been acted several times in a Boston hall, and had received high praise from literary censors there as a triumph of naturalism. The theme of this work, entitled "Margaret Fleming," is that of the social depravation which punishes a faithless wife, as contrasted with the forgiveness and reinstatement easily obtained by a husband guilty of infidelity.

What is Cognac?

This is a question that is now agitating some of the European experts in such matters. A Berlin journal inquires what the French themselves understand by "cognac." The district of Charente is the place of origin of real "cognac," and has, during the last seven years, produced an annual average of 535,000 gallons, while the annual export by France of liquor known as "cognac" has exceeded seven times this quantity. In trade, "cognac" is usually understood to be a brandy obtained by the distillation of wine, and which was formerly known as French brandy; but it has been shown by analysts, and in a bulky volume issued by the state department of hygiene, that there is no reliable method of distinguishing real brandy distilled from wine from the spurious. So it is interesting to have a decision of a French court of law as to what is understood by the word "cognac." A merchant of Angoulême, who bought brandy in Valenciennes and labled it "cognac," was prosecuted for so doing, but was acquitted on the ground that the word "cognac" is not to be exclusively understood as descriptive of the place of production, but often, as in the present instance, as descriptive of the nature of the product.

A capital pun may arise by pure accident, as recorded in Bucke's "Book of Table Talk." A Mr. Alexander Gun was dismissed from a post in the customs at Edinburgh for circulating some false rumor. The dismissal is said to have been thus noted in the customs books at the time: "A. Gun discharged for making a false report."

My Call.

I have a happy home. No shadow falls
Across the threshold of my peaceful life—
Love's labors light keep me in tuneful song,
And sweet contentment maketh rich my heart,
In this dear nest I thought to pass my days
Unmindful of the wider world beyond.
Walled round from wrong by true affection's hands,
I marvel'd much that any woman could
Seek more than this, if God had blessed her so.
I did not need to toil, and it was sweet
To sit and watch my lad and lassie grow;
To feel their loving arms about my neck,
And plan their future with a mother's hope.
But once, when they had gathered round my knee,
To hear the stories of the twilight hour,
I told them of the world's great misery—
Of little children, who were cold and starved,
And had no tender care, because a wrong,
Like the great monster of their fairy tales,
Had entered in and spoiled their pretty homes,
Killed all the love, and broke the mother's heart.
Then up my brave lad spoke, with flashing eye:
"Oh! mamma, can't you go and make them
stop,
And I will go myself when I am grown."
That night when I had kissed their fair,
sweet brows,
And said my prayers beside their sleeping forms,
I thought to rest, but all about my couch
Were little children's faces, starved and pale,
And weeping mothers praying me to come
And cry against this evil in the land.
* * * * *
No more my soul can sit in selfish ease;
At morn and noon and night I hear my call;
And when my children nestle in my arms
A voice says, sweet and clear, "This motherhood
Can feel for motherhood. Go forth and cry,
And these, thine own, shall catch thy spirit's call
And do a mighty work when thou art gone."
And I will go. It matters not if you
Who hear my voice shall say it is not best;
I follow on a form you cannot see,
And only thus my soul shall find its rest.
—Maria L. Draper.

A Story of General Sheridan.

Frank G. Carpenter, in one of his interesting letters, tells this good story, which is applicable to the silver question:
Speaking of these congressional cranks and their crazy theories, which they are already rushing into the two houses in the shape of bills, I heard Mr. Leech, the director of the mint, tell a good anti-silver story the other night concerning an incident of General George Sheridan's stumping campaign of last fall. Said Mr. Leech:
"Sheridan was going to make a speech in a town not a thousand miles away from Washington, and he was warned before he left the hotel that he would probably meet an old, gray-haired, long-bearded, plausible-looking fellow during his stay, and that he ought to have nothing to do with him, for he was a crank. The man was fully described to him and he knew him when he was accosted by him within a few steps of the hotel. The man asked Sheridan if he might reply to his speech that evening.
General Sheridan said that he had no control over the meeting and that he could not give him an opportunity. The old man then asked General Sheridan if he would answer him if he asked him any questions during his speech, and General Sheridan replied that he would. That night there was a very large audience in the city hall, and Sheridan's financial speech was received with great applause. In the midst of it the old man stood up and said: 'General Sheridan,
I may be wrong, but I would like to ask you a question.'
"There are nine chances out of ten that you are wrong," replied Sheridan, 'but I will answer you.'
"What I wish to ask," continued the old man, 'is this: Do you mean to say that if the government of the United States takes a piece of paper and writes on one side of it the words "This is a dollar," and under it the words "that it is legal for all debts, customs and public dues," and on the back of it prints the words "that this is one dollar," do you mean to say that that does not make it a good dollar and as good for use as any gold or silver coin in the United States?"
"General Sheridan looked at the man as he stood there in the midst of the audience and replied:
"Old man, I will answer your question by asking you another. Suppose the government of the United States should take you and stamp on your forehead the words "Daniel Webster." Suppose they should pick you up and run you through one of the great government printing presses and stamp on your back in letters a foot long, "Daniel Webster." Now would that make you a United States senator?"
"The audience roared and laughed and the old man sat down."

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber
and Elder Flower
Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term
is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and
freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats
ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her

A Lover's Revenge.

CHAPTER I.

"Is it true, Marie?" he asked, with blanched face and trembling voice. "Has Henry Fitz-Dougherty, my bosom friend, he whom I trusted as my own brother—has he supplanted me in your affections?"

"It is true, Leonidas," said the young lady, turning away coldly.

"False and perfidious friend! Pickle and heartless girl!" howled Leonidas Grimshaw, and he rushed forth from the house and wandered through the deserted streets till the dull, murky tinge of approaching day began to smear itself on the dingy sky. Then he went to his lonely, cheerless room, threw himself on his couch and tried to sleep.

But his feet were very, very cold.

CHAPTER II.

The ceremony that united Henry Fitz-Dougherty and Marie Penjarvish Kershock in marriage was over. The guests had departed, and the happy bride and exultant groom were looking over the glittering array of presents that had been sent to them.

"I have a little surprise for you, Henry, dear," said Marie, a smile of radiant beauty bisecting her lovely face.

"What is it, love?" inquired Henry.

"Leonidas Grimshaw has sent me a costly and elegant gift."

"That is kind of him."

"Indeed it is. The poor fellow has got over his broken heart. He cherishes only the kindest feelings for us now. See!"

"She drew forth from its hiding-place a lady's gold watch. It was a small, delicate, richly chased and ornamented affair, with her name engraved on the back, and had cost not less than $27.50 in cash."

CHAPTER III.

With a heavy, listless, uncertain step Henry Fitz-Dougherty entered his palatial home on Prairie avenue and sought his wife's boudoir.

"Marie," he said, as he threw his hat on the soft, velvety carpet, sat down on a costly work-basket and looked at her with blood-shot eyes, "the blow has fallen!"

"What is the matter, Henry?" exclaimed Mrs. Fitz-Dougherty in alarm.

"I have tried to weather the storm, Marie," he answered hopelessly, "thinking that a turn in the tide must come, but in vain! We must give up this home. My colossal fortune is gone. It could not stand the drain. The last bill of repairs on this, madam, wipes me completely out. We are beggars!"

And he placed in her lap a small, delicate, richly chased gold watch.

Leonidas Grimshaw was avenged.—Chicago Tribune.

Ask Yourself:

What greater loss than that of a true friend?

Are not short cuts in business often hazardous to honesty?

Is not equanimity the best of supports under difficulties?

How many hours of vexation will pay even a small debt?

Do not situations of hazard best prove the sincerity of friends?

How much solid acquirement results from promiscuous reading?

Is there anything like adversity to try the temper of our friends?

Is there not such a thing as being too prudent ever to fall in love?

Is precipitance in action any more dangerous than excessive caution?

How easy to mistake uniformity for unity and neutrality for independence!

O! how much avail are science and learning unaccompanied with good sense?

Is it not a pleasing error of the mind to look complacently on one's own mistakes and errors?

Why should druggists keep so many medicines when one patent medicine will cure everything?

Why is the man who does you an unprovoked and uncalled-for injury ever after your enemy.

Wise Men's Sayings.

To be generous, guiltless and of free disposition, is to take those things for bird-bolts that you deem cannon bullets—Shakespeare.

There is no harm in being respected in this world, as I have found out; and if you don't brag a little for yourself, depend on it, there is no person of your acquaintance who will tell the world of your merits and take the trouble off your hands.—Thackeray.

Rest remaineth for us a little way farther on. Heaven will not be an idle holiday, or an everlasting concert of sacred song. There will be no lack of employment there. Instead of a holy lounging place heaven will be a scene of such constant, pure, inspiring, blissful and unwearied activity that the word of God describes it as a perfect rest. Not an aching heart, or a tear-stained eye, or a tired foot forever and evermore.—Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D.

A True Ghost Story.

About a mile beyond the Beech hill stood Squire Macdonald's store, and one dreary night in late autumn there came thither first Rory O'More, and then Sandy Big John, and finally Alec Gillies, all in a high state of excitement, and asserting with much positiveness that they had seen the ghost on Beech hill. Now the squire was as shrewd, hard-headed and unsuperstitious a Scotchman as ever traded tea for butter or sugar for eggs, and he had no more faith in the Beech hill ghost than in the man in the moon.

But this time the testimony of the terrified witnesses happened to agree remarkably. The ghost had appeared to all in precisely the same form, namely, as a white, shapeless thing that rolled along the ground, uttering shrill and threatening shrieks. The matter was surely worth looking into.

"Hark ye, now," said the squire at last, "I believe you're nothing better than a parcel of foolish boys; and to prove it I'll go up to the Beech hill myself and see what it is that has come so near scaring the life out of you."

Thus speaking, he got his coat and hat, and, calling upon them to follow, set off for the scene of the ghost's walk. Rory and Sandy and Alec would much rather have been excused, but pride overcame their timidity, and they followed in their leader's track. Hardly had they reached the foot of the hill than the shrieks they had heard before came to their ears.

"There it is again!" exclaimed Rory, with trembling lips. "Can ye no hear it, squire?" "To be sure I can," responded the squire, stoutly; "and I'm going to see what it is. Come along."

The distance between the doughty squire and his followers increased as he went on, while the shrieks grew stronger with each forward step.

When about the middle of the ascent he saw the ghost. It was, as the men had reported, a white shapeless thing rolling upon the ground, and from it undoubtedly came the piercing cries which had proved so alarming.

Going straight up to the thing, the squire touched it with his foot, then bent down to feel it with his hand, and then burst out into a roar of laughter that at first startled the three farmers almost as much as the ghost's shrieks.

"Come here, you fools!" he shouted. "Come and see what your ghost is."

In a hesitating way they drew near and examined the cause of their affright. It was a white meal bag containing two very lively young pigs, which had in some way fallen off a farmer's wagon into the middle of the road, there to prove a source of terror to the superstitious and perhaps not altogether sober passersby.—Harper's Young People.

The Seven Golden Cities.

The "Seven Golden Cities," one of the most popular legends of the latter part of the "Dark Ages," were said to be situated on an island west of the African coast. The island is represented as abounding in gold, with magnificent houses and temples, "the high towers of which shown at a great distance." The legend also relates that at the time of the conquest of Spain and Portugal by the Moors, when the inhabitants fled in every direction to escape slavery, seven bishops, followed by a great number of people, took to ships and put boldly out on the high seas. After tossing about for some time they landed upon an unknown island, the famous spot which in after years became the seat of the "Seven Golden Cities." "This island," Heylyn says, "was exactly in midocean." After all had landed safely the wise old bishops burned the ships to prevent their followers from deserting, and founded the cities which have become so famous in song and story. This mysterious island was often sought by the early navigators. Those who went in search of it and never returned were popularly believed to have been detained by its inhabitants.

It is the instinct of man to commemorate events deemed of importance. Primarily, doubtless, the custom originated in families, and the commemoration was of the anniversaries of births and deaths of its members. Tribal formations followed; then nations and political events took their calendar days. Religion stands sponsor for the greatest number of festival days among all nations; and it must be conceded that the unwritten mandate of the Maker that we must cease from toil at stated times, has impelled man to make the best of it: allot days to rest, and to considerate attention to his fellows. Shabbath, the derivative word of Sabbath, means "to rest," and throughout the ages has designated the seventh day of the week the day for rest and worship. This first religious rest day came to us from Jehovah at the foundation of the world. It is written in the sacred work, "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made." Later, Moses said to his people: "This is that which the Lord hath said; to-morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord; bake that which ye will bake to-day, and seethe that ye will seethe; and that which remaineth over lay up for you, to be kept until the morning." In the Decalogue it is written, "Keep the sabbath day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. Six days thou shalt labour and do all thy work."

The Egyptians were perhaps the first to divide time into years, and they were made to include a certain number of lunar months. So early as 1500 B. C. they knew a year of 365 days, and divided it into three seasons: Winter, Summer, and the Nile, referring in the last to the inundation of the river. The time for the commencement of the year varied much among the earlier nations, and there is much variance in this day. The Carthaginians, Egyptians, Persians, Syrians, and other eastern peoples commenced the year at the autumnal equinox, and the civil year of the Jews then commenced, though their sacred year was reckoned from the vernal equinox. The Greeks commenced their years at first at the winter solstice; later, at the summer solstice. The first of January for the commencement of the year was first designated by the Romans, and was afterward adopted by the European nations.

New Year's Day has been celebrated in this country, it might be said, with double significance—that upon that day we do look back at the realities of the past; forward to the possibilities of the future. It is the day that to buoyant youth marks the turning at a milestone that brings him nearer to the period when he will be relieved from paternal thralldom. Giddy youth! he knoweth not the import of the life station he yearns for. A few years will pass; after he has encountered the severe rubs of actual life, then it will be he will realize that his happiest days were those when the responsibility of his subsistence and his course fell upon the parents. Later on in life he will look on New Year's day upon two pictures, one perhaps as gloomy as the other—on the one hand the events of the dead year; on the other the future, which means the launching upon an unknown sea. In later life New Year's will mean a menacing bell that earthly ending is nearer.

Perhaps the most appropriate New Year's article that was printed in this city appeared in the Sacramento Union on January 1, 1863. It was written at a time when the nation was in almost hopeless straits, and when, truly, the turning of the bloody ledger page of 1862 made way for the more sanguinary page of 1863. In our own city there did then exist the marks of the ravages of the great flood.

Yet it was the editor of the Union wrote hopefully, and he said: Another year borne away to the cemetery of the past! Another year, young and radiant, before us, marching on in the appointed path. We stand between memory and hope, listening to the one and watching the other. We bury the old year with the honors of war. Though we forget not the scars, we reckon the trophies, and as memory tells over the story of a career crowded with events, we experience many more thrills of exultation than blushes of shame. Eighteen hundred and sixty-two stormed through its brief existence. The very elements were at war, and stars "shot madly from their spheres." Comets, which olden superstition clothed with baleful significance, swept over the visible heavens, and the moon suffered an eclipse. Rivers swelled over their earthly bounds and devoured the fruits of husbandry. The terrible roll of battle-thunder seldom ceased from January to December, ranging from Kansas to the Chesapeake, from the Cumberland Valley of Pennsylvania to the Rio Grande. Armies of a magnitude greater than any that had previously appeared upon the soil of the New World met in the shock of deadly strife, and thousands of our best and bravest sank into patriot graves beneath the bullets of the foe. Reverses came, but we were not dismayed—nay, rather provoked to mightier efforts. Like the old Antæus, the nation arose stronger after every fall, and filled with a keener zest for battle. We caught a moral gleam from each cloud of defeat, and a struggle for unity of soil bloomed into a contest for the good old cause of the rights of man. Balance the books for the year and it will be found that our net gain is enormous. * * * We have gathered more laurel than cypress, and the places of our fallen heroes are filled by patriots equally brave and equally ready for the shock of arms. Therefore, bury the old year with the honors of war. The past has none that has left a broader or a brighter trace. The new year, we all pray, is to bring to our country liberty, union, and peace—ends that sanctify the use of the sword. It finds the nation full of vital energy, with all its armor on, trained by experience, inspired by a glorious zeal, marching on with an unfaltering determination to make the war worth all the cost. The New Year not only wields the sword, but breaks the chain. It proclaims liberty to all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof. It strikes away the shackles from the genius of America. It erases a huge stain from the national escutcheon. Here and there a dark spot may remain, but our nationality becomes a synonym for freedom for all. By the solemn pledge of the president of the United States, this New Year's Day is consecrated the liberty. The monster that was tolerated until it struck at the national heart is to receive a mortal wound. The welcome to the new year, rung out from bells and thundered from cannon, is a welcome to our president's promised decree of divorce between the great republic and slavery. There can be no clouds to which such an act will not give a silver lining—no death of a nation that gives such an evidence or moral life. May this prove a "Happy New Year" to all the land.

The New Year's Day on which that editor wrote was solemnized by the promulgation of the proclamation of emancipation by President Lincoln, a document that, when presented to the cabinet, was remarked of by Mr. Secretary Chase: "This paper is of the utmost importance; greater than any state paper ever made by this government. A paper of so much importance, and involving the liberties of so many people, ought, I think, to make some reference to Deity. I do not observe anything of the kind in it." The president said: "No; I overlooked it. Some reference to Deity must be inserted. Mr. Chase, won't you make a draft of what you think ought to be inserted?" At the next cabinet meeting the secretary presented the following, which met with Mr. Lincoln's approval: "And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God." So early as August, 1862, Mr. Lincoln had urged the adoption of a vigorous policy against slavery in the seceded states at the proper time, but he did not feel the issuance of a proclamation of emancipation would be effective until after there had been a decisive battle gained by the union arms. In August, 1862, the impetuous Mr. Greeley called upon the president and urged him, on behalf of "twenty millions," to issue a proclamation of freedom to all slaves in the confederate states; and he also wrote an editorial article in the Tribune on the same subject. The president's letter to Mr. Greeley was pithy, and, in view of the proclamation that was promulgated the following New Year's Day, we reproduce it.

WASHINGTON, August 22, 1862.

Hon. Horace Greeley—DEAR SIR: I have just read yours of the 19th addressed to myself through the New York Tribune. If there be in it any statements or assumptions of fact which I may know to be erroneous, I do not now and here controvert them. If there be in it any inferences which I may believe to be falsely drawn, I do not now and here argue against them. If there be perceptible in it an impatient and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an old friend, whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

As to the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not meant to leave anyone in doubt. I would save the union. I would save it the shortest way under the constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the union will be "the union as it was." If there be those who would not save the union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would destroy slavery, I do not agree with them.

My paramount object in this struggle is to save the union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the union without freeing any slaves I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race I do because I believe it helps to save the union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts this cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors, when shown to be errors; and I shall adopt new views as fast as they shall appear to be true views.

I have here stated my purpose, according to my view or official duty; and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free.

A. LINCOLN.

The battle of Antietam was fought in Maryland September 17, 1862, and Lee was repulsed. This proved the decisive point with the president, and on the 22d he issued the preliminary proclamation. Of that document he said: "The truth is just this: When Lee came over the river, I made a resolution that if McClellan drove him back I would send the proclamation after him. The battle of Antietam was fought Wednesday, and until Saturday I could not find out whether we had gained a victory or lost a battle. It was then too late to issue the proclamation that day, and the fact is I fixed it up a little Sunday, and Monday I let them have it." Then it was the president declared that on the 1st of January, 1863, "all persons held as slaves within any state or designated part of a state, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will no acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom." True to his word, on the following New Year's Day the final proclamation was issued; and it was effective. Its importance was hardly realized at the time, and we doubt if those immediately affected by it—the negroes—feel the gratitude they should for its promulgation. It was truly a new year's gift to a nation and to civilization.

Book education is only a part of the general education necessary to combat with the affairs of the world. An experience and knowledge of human nature forms an important factor in our general education. The training of the will-powers is another ingredient. With a knowledge of books combined with a training of the will-powers and knowledge of human nature, education might be said to be finished. We often find very illiterate men successful in business and exercising great political as well as personal influence, but they always combine the two last mentioned elements of education without book learning. On the other hand, there are college-bred men whose lives are absolute failures, although possessed of considerable abilities. We call these men educated, but this is a misnomer; they are learned in book lore, but ignorant of the other essential elements that go to make up education. Their energies have not been trained, and they have no knowledge of the ordinary affairs of the world. In this view of the relative education of the college man and the illiterate business man the latter has the best of it, because he possesses more of the elements of a worldly education than the former.

It is contended by calamity orators and alleged reformers that the poor boy has no chance in the struggle for education and advancement in these days. As a matter of fact, it is only the poor boy that can obtain a thorough, all-round education which necessarily includes the worldly experience and trained will-power. He learns the ways as they exist, not as they are read in books. He sees and feels the stern realities while the apparently more favored is spoiled with comforts. He is down in the busy world getting experience while the pampered youth is obtaining nothing but book learning. The great bulk of education is derived from being thrown on our own resources. The school of experience is more necessary than books, but it takes the latter to make a complete, a finished education. There is no greater imbecile than a book-learned man without any worldly experience. It is also unfortunate to see the illiterate, but successful business man—of the two the world, however, looks with more favor on the latter.

It is strange to what lengths partisan rancor carries some newspapers. Now comes the St. Louis Republic and accuses the administration at Washington, particularly Secretary Blaine, with trying to force a war with Chile for individual and personal gain; not political, but financial. This statement is made in the face of all the efforts of the administration to avoid a clash. The president in a most dignified and patient manner has borne with repeated insults of the Chilean officials, for the purpose of evading the arbitrament of war. Yet we find those claiming to be Americans so degenerate as to attribute selfish motives to the great minister of state. With such people all love of country and the country's honor is sunk into the slums of partisanship.

With them even the country's honor must be sacrificed to bring the opposing administration in disrepute. A number of the alleged leading democratic papers are making the same hue and cry. It is not possible for such hide-bound people to sink party below country.

There has been so much sensation about official and legislative corruption, growing out of the investigations by the late grand jury of San Francisco, it occurs to us that there must be some legal way of getting at all these matters. There never was any occasion to override principles of civil liberty, or an encroachment on the rights of the citizen, such as was attempted by Judge Wallace. Certainly the twelve superior judges of San Francisco can select a good responsible grand jury that will faithfully regulate all the shortcomings in office in every department from supervisors to the state legislature. The mere fact that the means adopted in selecting the late grand jury were illegal, is no reason why a legal inquisition should not be called into existence at an early date.

Mr. White, of the board of freeholders, has submitted a skeleton charter, a matter in perfect propriety; and concerning his suggestions we have very little of adverse criticism. If we understand it aright, it is based upon the general principle upon which our federal and state governments are administered—a separation of the executive, legislative and judicial departments. That is right. The board of aldermen, or trustees, should exercise legislative functions only, and the executive head, the mayor, should be elected independently by the people, and he should have reasonable veto power. Likewise with judicial officers. They should be chosen directly by the people, and should have no duties to perform aside from those that pertain to their governmental department. We do believe in a large legislative board, and believe its members should be paid. If the city expects its business properly attended to it should compensate. True it has been, our school and fire departments have for years been conducted by boards, the members of which are not paid; but has it been satisfactory? The position of alderman, or trustee, is of more responsibility; and, as we look upon it, a cheap man is the dearest in the long run. While we do agree with Mr. White in the main, we most seriously object to this proposition: "The superintendent of schools to be a practical, experienced educator, appointed by the board of directors"—meaning to be appointed by the school board. There are two vital objections to that proposition. In the first place, "a practical, experienced educator," as a rule, becomes the most impractical and inexperienced manager when he gets outside of a school-room; and there is no sense in exacting any such qualification. Next, the superintendent should be selected by the people, and he should be in never so small a degree the creature of the school board. Of necessity powers are lodged in the superintendent that are delicate and summary. Were it the board held the axe above his head, he would lack in independence. We must not forget that an officer elected by a people can do as he pleases; and experience has demonstrated that, with few exceptions, he pleases to do right. So nearly as practicable, we favor the election of officers by the people; then there will be no middle-men to pull the string. Particularly should every legislative board have a balancing wheel. In the school board the balance is with the superintendent; he has behind him the power of the people. Let it remain as it is. Reading the preliminary discussions of the freeholders, we must in good nature remind Major Weinstock that no governmental charter will ever be drafted save there will be a loophole for political bosses. Dogmatically the major remarked: "If the respectable element were permitted to conduct affairs unmolested, then we would have good government, with a board of trustees of either three or twenty members. But we all know that in all cities there are political schemers who make a business of politics. In my judgment, I would find it much more difficult, if I were a boss, to control fifteen men than five. We should aim to make it as difficult as possible for the bosses to gain control. I believe that it is certainly a more difficult task to rule a body of fifteen than a body of seven." Political bossism has existed since the foundation of human government; it will exist till the ending of time. Did Major Weinstock reflect what he includes in the "respectable element?" Generally it is esteemed the class who remain at home on primary-election days; wait until after nominations have been made, and then bolt the ticket because they were not waited upon and their franchise received upon a silver platter. Candidly, we have little respect for the "respectable element" of Sacramento, if it means the men who are so very pure they have to hire a hall and guard its entry with a doorkeeper. The experience of the last school election was of profit to us. The harvest was bountiful—that of contempt for the intolerant. That Major Weinstock holds a position of responsibility, his expressions are the subjects of just criticism. To him we say: "Give us a good, modern charter, and do not try and reform the world. Men have succeeded in framing fundamental laws that have endured for centuries; we are not aware the man who attempted to accelerate the revolutions of our sphere on its axis did succeed. Archimedes was not a freeholder of Syracuse, yet his famous word, "Eureka," is engraven on the coat-of-arms of California. A man who did live before his age, he did conceive he could move the world, had he a lever long enough. Archimedes found not his lengthy lever; major, go slow.

The organization of the Newspaper Writer's Union in this city is a proper movement, and one which should receive the cordial approval of fraternal labor organizations generally. We would be disposed to go further than our brethren of the daily press, and would inaugurate a movement that would raise the tone of the weeklies. It may seem a severe criticism, but in truth it is the country weeklies in California do not at all compare with those published ten or twenty years ago. With boiler plate matter, unskilled composition, bad editing, and execrable presswork we have, with few exceptions, productions that would have perhaps been creditable in the primitive days of printing. Newspaper writers are as deserving of protection as any other class of workers. As it has been they have of late been poorly paid; yet their work is important and painstaking. It has happened, often does happen, that the newspaper writer receives less than the printer who sets his copy. The printer has the good fortune that he is protected by the union; why in reason should not his coadjutor, the writer, be likewise protected? We wish this movement to be successful; hope it will spread throughout the state.

Curious Inventions.

The history and growth of inventions are subjects in which all are interested. The stylograph pen brought in £40,000 a year, the India rubber tips to pencils £20,000, metal plates for protecting the soles and heels of boots and shoes brought in £250,000 in all, the roller skate £200,000.

A clergyman realized £400 a week by the invention of a toy; another toy, the return ball, brought in an income of £10,000; the "Dancing Jim Crow," £15,000 a year. The inventor of a copper cap for children's boots was able to leave his heirs £400,000, while Singer, of sewing machine fame, left at his death nearly £3,000,000.

There are other and wonderful things which people have thought it worth while to patent, strong in the hopes of making a big fortune in the near future, only to find in so many cases that their inventions were impracticable and very often perfectly ridiculous.

Among such may be mentioned a child's bib with a trough attached, the whole formed of some waterproof material; a pocket which cannot be picked; a muff and boa filled with air to save you from a watery grave; cuffs and collars made of steel, painted or enameled white; trousers with double legs—on the outer legs getting soiled or bespattered you tuck them up and behold a clean pair. This arrangement would be suitable, I should say, only when worn with an overcoat.

Under the head of umbrellas and walking sticks we find some marvelous inventions. One is an umbrella which in some wonderful way is converted into a walking stick, and so formed that a spear can be attached, when it is used as a weapon of offense and defense. I recommend it to elderly ladies in the dog days as a protection against the sun and mad dogs. The next invention is a rain absorber, to prevent rain from running down from hats and umbrellas.

The absorber is formed either of uncovered sponges or of sponges covered by a fabric. We are told that the absorber can be readily removed from the article, squeezed, and replaced. We come next to an article which the inventor has named (take a long breath and shut your eyes) the "Rliabdoskidophorus." This is an umbrella which can be taken apart; the silk and ribs being hidden within the stick, it is thus transformed into a stout walking stick.—Strand Magazine.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The clove plays the most important part between the acts at the theater.

An enterprising showman proposes to make an exhibit of volcanoes at the world's fair.

Patti's appearance is said to have been greatly improved by her abandonment of her golden coiffure for the natural, dark locks with which the public had long been familiar.

The veteran actor Couldock wrote his name on the register of a Memphis hotel the other day in as firm and clear a hand as if he were 17 instead of 70. After a lifetime spent in the wearing work of the stage, he finds himself as vigorous and hearty as a man of half his years.

Mrs. C. P. Huntington, wife of the great Pacific railroad magnate, whose colossal fortune is estimated at $30,000,000, finds her favorite diversion in the stage, and is a frequent attendant at the New York theaters. On the first night of any important production she is always present, and no one knows the good points of a play better, or appreciates them more highly, than she.

Mme. Melba, the prima donna whose fascinations have caused the young Duc d'Orleans so much unpleasant notoriety, is said to have a "small, three-cornered, quick and perceptive eye." She is of Scotch descent, though born in Australia, and her mother was a rigid Presbyterian. Her real name is Nellie Mitchell, and her father, David Mitchell, was a violinist of wide reputation. Mme. Melba's stage name is adopted from the name of the Australian city Melbourne, as Albani's is from Albany and Emma Nevada's from her native state in the Sierras.

In some parts of the world the playwright who would bring a noble Jew upon the stage must crave the audience's indulgence and sympathy in language such as that in Cumberland's apologetic prologue to The Jew:

"To your candour we appeal this night
For a poor client, for a luckless wight, Whom bard ne'er favored; whose sad fate has been
Never to share in one applauding scene.
In souls like yours there should be found a place
For every victim of unjust disgrace."

Professor von Ihring, an eminent German jurist, in his book, "The Struggle for Law," discourses as follows on Shylock's wrongs: "I crave the law." In these four words the poet has described the relation of law in the subjective to law in the objective sense of the term, and the meaning of the struggle for law, in a manner better than any philosopher of the law could have done it. These four words change Shylock's claim into a question of the law of Venice. To what mighty giant dimensions does not the weak man grow when he speaks these words! It is no longer the Jew demanding his pound of flesh; it is the law of Venice itself knocking at the door of justice; for his rights and the law of Venice are one and the same; they both stand or fall together. And when he finally succumbs under the weight of the judge's decision, who wipes out his rights by a shocking piece of pleasantry; when we see him pursued by bitter scorn, bowed, broken, tottering on his way, who can help feeling that in him the law of Venice is humbled? that it is not the Jew, Shylock, who moves painfully away, but the typical figure of the Jew in the Middle Ages, that pariah of society who cried in vain for justice? * * * He is only the despised mediæval Jew, to whom justice is done by defrauding him. The jurist can only say that the bond was in itself null and void, because its provisions were contrary to good morals. But failing to take this ground, it was wretched subterfuge, a miserable piece of pettifoggery, to deny the right to shed blood in cutting the pound of flesh. Just as well might the judge deny to the person whose right to an easement he acknowledged, the right to leave footprints on the land because this was not expressly stipulated for in the grant."

To one who walks past St. Paul's church at the present time, the following incident seems hardly possible: On a Sunday during the year 1810, while the service was in progress, an Indian in full dress passed up the center aisle of St. Paul's, and, facing the congregation, gave a fearful warwhoop, and then passed leisurely out of the building, unmolested. The above incident was related by one of the members of the Duyckinck family of this city, who had it from her grandfather, who was present when the incident occurred.—Trinity, N. Y., Record.

A little girl of six, who complained of being left alone in the dark after she was in bed, and was told by her mother that she need not be afraid, as God was with her, although there was no light. Whereupon the child replied: "Mother, dear, I'd much rather you took God away and left the candle."

Book Chat.

The superficial reader goes over a novel in less than no time. The thread of the story is all that is wanted.

Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont is reported as being engaged on an important piece of literary work which has engrossed her attention for the last six months.

Emperor Francis Joseph has given his assent to the publication of a work by Archduchess Stephanie describing her travels, and adorned with her own pen drawings.

Ambitious author—Naggus, I am obliged to you for not pulling my last story all to pieces. Literary editor—Not at all, Borus. I couldn't get hold of the thread of it.

A recent book on equatorial Africa speaks of a plant growing in great profusion and having an odor somewhat resembling that of musk, which, when pulled up and placed close to a person, keeps away mosquitoes.

Justice Bradley began buying books fifty years ago, when at school, and has kept it up ever since. Even the ball-room and dining-room of his cozy old mansion on I street are packed with the bibliophilistic wealth of which the house, indeed, is literally full to overflowing.

The Oxford university press has just issued the most diminutive bible in existence. It is finely printed on Oxford Indian paper, and its minute dimensions are only three and three-fourths inches in length, two and one-eighth inches wide, and seven-eighths of an inch in thickness.

The newspaper is an English product, the first issue having been in that language, and the larger proportion of all the newspapers in the world are published in the English tongue. In 1876 there were 7,500 newspapers in the English tongue, and only about 6,000 in all the other tongues. This proportion is probably maintained to-day.

An intimate friend of Lord Tennyson, according to the Bookman, has a letter giving an account of the manner in which he first essayed to make poetry. One day, at about the age of 16, he was too ill to go to church. His brother suggested that he should employ his spare time in trying to write a poem. The boy did so, and discovered for the first time his capacity for poetical expression.

Never touch a book with damp or soiled hands. Always keep your place with a thin book mark. Always place a large book on the table before opening it. Always turn leaves from the top with the middle or forefinger. Never pull a book from a shelf by the binding at the top, but by the back. Never touch a book with a damp cloth, nor with a sponge in any form. Never place another book or anything else upon the leaves of an open book. Never rub dust from books, but brush it off with a soft, dry cloth or duster.

The secrets of the late Lord Lytton's long residence in India were so vividly impressed on his mind that he once said to a friend: "Sometimes when walking on a sunny day through the embassy, I recall the history and origin of the various objects which I have collected, then I shut my eyes and seem to go through that distant country, seeing it with wonderful vividness to the smallest details—the slightest smile of my wife, the heads of the Hindus thronging to see us—and all this with such exactitude that on reopening my eyes it takes a little time to realize where I am."

Frank R. Stockton's pet fruit is said to be the crab-apple. Howells exhibits a preference for the pumpkin, especially in the form of pies, and James loves hot-house grapes. The flowery pomegranate is believed to be Amelie Rives' favorite, and the luscious watermelon the choice of Joel Chandler Harris. Eugene Field denoted his taste in his song of the "Little Peach," and James Whitcomb Riley dotes upon the persimmon just crisped and colored by the first fine frost of fall. Lafcadio Hearn loves the guava, and Ella Wheeler Wilcox the banana, while Mrs. Cruger's voice is heard for the Bartlett pear, and Minna Irving's for the chestnut. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

A roll measuring about fifteen feet long, containing poems hitherto unknown of Herodotus in Seazon or chohambic meter, has just been exhibited in the manuscript department of the British museum. One of the poems is entitled "The Schoolmaster." A mother appears before the master called Lampriscus. She is accompanied by her son, and entreates the pedagogue to flog him within an inch of his life because the boy is the terror of her existence. He has nearly ruined her by playing pitch-and-toss, he associates with the lowest characters of the town, and if he is asked to spell the name of Maron he turns it into Simon; in fact, he has entirely got beyond the control of his parents. Lampriscus, therefore, fetches his instrument of correction, which is made of cowhide, and applies it without mercy. The boy howls and promises to be good, and when the schoolmaster thinks that the youth has had enough, he tells the mother to keep him a close prisoner for some time to come.

Dr. McLoid, the famous Scotch divine, was crossing a lake in company with Dr. McGregor and a party when a fearful squall arose. Dr. McLoid was an enormous man and a thorough athlete, and when one of the women shrieked, "Dr. McLoid! The poets and poetesses of the effete east will no doubt be glad to learn these interesting facts about "the poet-laureate of the World's Fair," Miss Harriet Monroe, the handsome daughter of a Chicago lawyer. She has written an extensive and dramatic tragedy of mediæval Italian life, in five acts and a prologue, besides much "magazine verse," which is said to have "gone off to her own and the critics' satisfaction."

There was a noticeable predominance of "scarlet trimmings" among the ladies who attended the reception of Cardinal Gibbons on 'change yesterday. Noticing this, Archbishop Ryan, who stood beside the cardinal, nudged the latter, and said: "Your eminence, the city authorities will be after you if they see what's going on." "Why?" inquired the cardinal; "what have I done?" "Well," said the archbishop, "the health board may charge you with spreading the scarlet fever."

A Russian journal reports an interesting case of a philanthropic physician. Visiting the patients of his district the doctor found that in many instances their sickness was caused by hunger. To the most needy he prescribed "six pounds of pure rye flour in doses of two pounds a day." He ordered his patient to get the medicine at the drug store of the nearest village, where it would be issued free of charge every day. The good doctor made arrangements with the druggist to supply the flour at his expense. In this way his patients will be kept from starvation the whole winter.

A prominent lawyer of this state tells the following story of his experience when he first began practising law: One of his first clients was a raw but shrewd specimen from Pike county, seeking light on a knotty point. He was shown he had no case, and was on the point of nonchalantly walking out of the office, when he was asked for the fee. "What for? You haven't given me anything." "For advice," explained the young lawyer. "I have spent a great deal of time and money in acquiring this knowledge." The fellow thought a moment and then said bluntly: "Wa'al, then, I'll not take your advice," and walked off. His impudence was rewarded by escaping the fee.

The celebrated physician, Dr. Jacoby, was walking along Broadway one day, when he met an old gentleman who was very rich, but who at the same time was noted for his extreme stinginess. The old man, who was somewhat of a hypochondriac, imagined that he could get some medical advice from Jacoby without paying for it. "Doctor, I am feeling very poorly." "Where do you suffer most?" "In my stomach, doctor." "Ah, that's bad. Please shut your eyes. That's right. Now put out your tongue, so that I can examine it closely." The invalid did as he was told. After he had waited patiently for about ten minutes, he opened his eyes and found himself surrounded by a crowd, who supposed that he was crazy. Dr. Jacoby had, in the meantime, disappeared.

Marie Antoinette made liberal use of the tub, putting into the water wild thyme, laurel leaves, marjory, and a little sea salt. This recipe was obtained from Louis XIV's physician, Fagou, who used to recommend taking such baths, cold in winter and lukewarm in summer, to accustom the skin to stand the changes of the temperature.

We must confess neglect that we spoke not of the Christmas edition of the Oakland Tribune in our last issue. That we should have written then comes now. It seems that the attacks of the Catholic bishops in France on the laws of the republic, and their endeavor to establish the temporal power of the papacy, have been promptly met by the French senate, which, by a vote of 211 to 57, has adopted an order pledging the government to exercise its rights to compel the clergy not only to respect the republic, but to submit to its laws.

The male German or Irish immigrant either brings a wife with him, finds one in America soon after his arrival or sends for his sweetheart when he has established himself. Four-fifths of the Italians who come to America do not bring women, form no alliances of a permanent character with the women who are here, and never send for women left behind. The result is that wages in sections where Germans or Irishmen control the market are down to the minimum of subsistence for a man with a family, while in sections controlled by the Italian, wages have fallen to the minimum of subsistence for a man without a family.

Children are sometimes original even to drollery. Christmas a little girl friend found for her on the family tree a chatelaine bag, and in it was a bright big dollar. Pleased, of course, she admired her present, when, after an inspection of the coin, she merrily exclaimed: “O dear! Auntie, I can't spend this money; it's only a Sunday-school dollar; it has on it ‘In God We Trust!’” Her lack of familiarity with the coin of the realm finds ready explanation in the fact that she is the ward of an attaché of this journal.

Lige Hart's little boy, Vivian, is a veritable little skeptic on the ideal Santa Claus. On Christmas eve he took the youngster with him when he made the purchase of a present for Mrs. Hart, and cautioned him not to mention the fact to his mother. On Christmas morning when the family Christmas tree was disclosed, the young skeptic said, “Papa, did Santa Claus bring that tree?” “Well, I suppose so,” said Lige. “Did he put all those presents on the tree?” continued the youngster. “That is what they say,” said the father. “Well,” said the boy, “if that is so, how is it mamma's present which you bought, is on the tree?” This was a poser for Lige.

Hard, indeed, is the way of the plagiarist in the realm of Afghanistan. According to recent reports from that country, a certain Mirza Ahmad was brought before the Emir, charged with misappropriation of public funds. In the course of the trial it was discovered that the defendant had been guilty of writing poetry which did not possess the virtue of originality. That fact enraged the Emir. “The accusation of purloining public money,” declared his majesty in the decision, “has not been proved. For that I cannot punish you. But I cannot excuse the theft of the ideas of Laadi and Haffiz, the old poets. As a penalty I order your tongue pierced by long, thick needles.” The poor writer was subjected to the torture, and the Emir has little fear that Mirza will again attempt to force his hexameters upon an “indulgent” monarch.

It is impossible in the light of modern research to reconcile the dates of the Old Testament, since Usher, Blair, and over one hundred other persons give different dates for the creation and the flood. Until within a comparatively recent time all evangelical churches assumed the authenticity of the Mosaic history purporting to begin with the beginning of the world, 4004 B. C., and to end in 1451, shortly after the death of Moses, whose death it records, and all this is supposed to have been written by Moses himself. But since Bishop Calenso, Dean Stanley and many other biblical scholars, in the church as well as without, have denied the Mosaic authority of the Pentateuch, the dates fixed for important historical events preceding the times of Moses, have been sadly disarranged. There is no account of the sinking of Atlantis and no record thereof corresponding with the biblical account of the flood.

A Modern Parable.

An old Arab about to die called his three sons to his bedside to make known to them his last wishes. “As a legacy,” he said, “I bequeath to you the three objects before you—an old rug, a saucepan and a stick.” And when his sons protested against the paltry value of their patrimony, the sick man went on to say: “Don't you make a mistake; these three bequests are more valuable than you think. Thus, the rug has the marvelous property of conveying through space, as quick as thought any one who sits upon it and directs it where to go. The saucepan, like a cornucopia, is filled at a moment's notice with any kind of food its owner may desire. In striking the ground with the stick you can produce as many jewels and precious stones as you may wish for. Divide the three talismans among you.”

Not being able to agree as to the distribution of the bequests, the three brothers called in the aid of an arbitrator.

“I see how it is,” said the latter; “each of you would like to have the whole of the paternal heritage to himself.”

“Just so!” the three brothers answered in a chorus.

“Well, then, this is what I propose: You shall compete for it. The first of you that gets to that tree yonder shall be proclaimed sole heir and may dispose of the three talismans.”

At a given signal the three started off to run. At the same moment the obliging arbitrator snatched up the stick and saucepan, seated himself on the rug and disappeared.

The heritage is Cyprus. The three brethren are France, Italy and Russia. England is the arbitrator.

The Late Geo. W. Chesley.

A committee appointed by the Pioneer Society, at the meeting next following Mr. Chesley's death, have reported as follows to the association:

By the decree of the Supreme Ruler of the universe who controls the destinies of men, an honored and beloved member of our society has been removed from earth, and we to-day stand in the shadow of a great sorrow.

The great warm heart of our friend and brother, George W. Chesley, is now cold and still in the embrace of death. “The finger of God touched him and he slept.” May the brightest flowers of spring bloom perennially above his last earthly resting place.

Brother Chesley died at his home in this city, after a long and painful illness, on the twenty-second day of November last, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. During his long sickness, extending over a period of more than two years, he was patiently and tenderly watched and nursed by his accomplished and devoted wife, with all the tender care, anxious solicitude and sublime fortitude of the faithful, loving wife and devout Christian.

Brother Chesley was born in Dover, New Hampshire, on the third day of February, 1822, and in 1844 he was united in marriage at Providence, Rhode Island, to Miss Alice Whipple, a descendant of one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. On the fifth day of February, 1849, he sailed from the city of New York for California, and landed in the city of San Francisco on the thirteenth day of June, 1849, and soon thereafter came to Sacramento, where he resided up to the time of his death.

By a long and intimate association with him, his brother pioneers had learned to love him and to appreciate his noble traits of head and heart. For three years he was president of this Society of Pioneers, and his unflinching fidelity to the trust reposed in him, his courtly dignity, his kind and courteous bearing, his joyous, happy nature, his love for his brethren and his solicitude for their welfare, endeared him to us, and we will ever keep his memory sacred and green in our hearts.

He was one of that heroic band of pioneers that laid the foundation of a great empire on the western verge of this continent. He knew the privation, heroism and self-sacrifice of a California pioneer. He had an abiding faith in the future glory of the state, and worked with indomitable will and untiring energy to promote her glory and rejoiced in her strength, her pure enlightened civilization, her vast resources and her proud position as a sovereign state of the American union; to her advancement and prosperity he gave the best years of his life. He loved Sacramento, the city of his home, and her people, with all the devotion of his loving, generous nature. Ever ready with quick intelligence and strong hand to aid and advance her prosperity and contribute to the happiness of her people. He was a true and faithful friend, a prince in his generous hospitality. He was an order-loving, law-abiding citizen, just to his fellow-men and loyal to his country. He was a kind, loving, devoted husband, and in every relation in life he was a genial, gracious, Christian gentleman. With a heart overflowing with human charity, the widow and orphan, the poor homeless wanderer, the afflicted and destitute, received succor from his hands and infinite tender sympathy from his heart, with words of hope, kindness and encouragement from his lips.

He has gone before—we soon must follow him in the long dread sleep of death.

“Our hearts like muffled drums are beating funeral marches to the grave.” Sleep on, brave heart, in eternal rest, free from sickness and sorrow, pain and death, safe in your immortality. Rest in your “low green tent whose curtains never outward swing,” until the Supreme Judge of the living and the dead, shall call you to a bright deliverance, a glorious redemption.

“Yet love will dream, and faith will trust,
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own!”

Resolved, That we tender to his bereaved widow our sincere, heartfelt condolence in this her sad hour of affliction and sorrow.

Resolved, That this memorial be entered upon the records of this society, and an engrossed copy thereof be presented to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further token of our love and esteem for our deceased brother, the members of this society will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Requiescat in pace.

1848-1891.

NEW YORK, Dec. 25, 1891.

EDITORS THEMIS:—Forty-three years ago this day the writer passed on the banks of the Mokelumne river, at the foot of what was then called the “Big Hill.” On that evening the occupants of a large log cabin, known as “Independence Hall,” built by a party of thirty-two volunteers of Stevenson's regiment, gave an entertainment to which others of their comrades were invited, among the number being the “Roach party,” numbering fourteen members of the same regiment, who were located near by in two wall tents for sleeping quarters, one A tent for the storage of provisions and a brush house for a kitchen. In all some sixty assembled in “Independence Hall,” and notwithstanding very poor liquor, costing ten dollars a bottle, there was enough provided to enliven the evening entertainment, which consisted of speeches, songs and anecdotes. The evening was enjoyed by all present, not a harsh word was uttered and the company parted at midnight as orderly as any like assemblage in more civilized parts of the globe. On New Year's evening of 1849 the Roach party returned the compliment.

To-day, in this for off section, I sit and live anew in memory that Christmas evening passed amid the snow-clad hills of that mining district, and try to recall the faces of those old familiar friends and comrades. Almost within sound of my voice are four, viz., James E. Nuttman, Russell Myers, Charles J. McPherson and William H. Rogers, who with myself are residents of this great city; Saml. W. Pearsall has always remained at the old spot or near by; James Harron is in Fresno county, Cal.; Charles H. Thurston at Marysville, Cal., and I doubt if more than ten of that evening party are living this day. The writer was one of the youngest of those present—scarce eighteen years old. Of the Roach party, William Roach, Aaron Lyons and James A. Gray were afterwards officers of Monterey county, and all three died there; John Wolfe died in this city some eighteen months ago, leaving a large fortune; John W. Moore was killed by the Indians in 1851 in the Mariposa mountains; Henry and John Wilson, John Inall, John Monroe and Charles Ogle, died at various parts of the country.

Life in the mining districts in those early days was devoid of almost every comfort. Isolated as it were from the rest of the world, yet withal a happy, joyous lot of youths just released from military restraint. As law abiding and orderly as any party of men in later days, hospitable to the last degree, no traveler ever needed a meal in that period that his wants were not readily furnished. He had no need of a purse, for no recompense would be received. There may be those who sneer at the early gold-diggers and the lasting love that exists to this day between them, but those were days when true manhood asserted itself, and though a mere boy in years, am glad to think it is my good fortune to be classed among the rough and hardy inhabitants of the mountains in those stirring times.

The Roach party, made up of members of Co. D, Stevenson's regiment: Wm. Roach, Francis D. Clark, James A. Gray, Aaron Lyons, John Wilson, Henry J. Wilson, John Hall, James Harron, Charles Ogle, John Wolfe, John W. Moore, Charles C. Clapp, and two others, whose names I am unable to recall.

During that winter in the mines the ruling prices were: Boots, $100 a pair; blankets, $50 a pair, while flour, coffee, sugar, salt pork, rice and other provisions, ranged from $1 to $3 per pound, and yet these prices were cheerfully paid. Liquor $4 a drink; but I had no use for it. F. D. C.

A Warning in a Dream.

One of the most terrible and pathetic stories of warnings by dreams is told by the biographers of that great military hero, Field Marshal Blucher. Some months after the battle of Waterloo Blucher retired to the solitude of his country estate, and when invited to the palace of the king of Prussia declined the honor. The king then went to see his favorite general, and found him in great distress. He told the monarch how, when a youth, he had served with the Swedish army, but having been taken prisoner by the Prussians, could only get leave to visit his parents on condition of accepting a commission in the Prussian army. When he knocked at the door of his father's house there came no answer. He burst it open and hurried through the corridors to the reception room, where he found his father, mother and sisters all in deep mourning. His father repelled his advances with indignation, while mother and sisters shrank from his embraces. Finally he knelt at his mother's knee, but at the first touch of his hand the dress fell and he found that he had held a skeleton in his arms. There was a shout of derision as the whole company vanished into space. “Three months ago, sire,” said Blucher, “I had a dream in which that old scene was exactly reproduced. All the members of my family said: ‘We will meet again on the 11th of August.’ This is the —” The old man leaned back in his chair, and as the king looked upon his general he saw that he was dead.

The Reaper, Death.

Mrs. Alice M. Chesley survived her husband, the late Geo. W. Chesley, only a few weeks. Last Sunday Mrs. Chesley expired after a brief illness. Thus within the period of one month, this couple, who occupied a prominent social position and were pioneers in the business as well as social world, have passed to the dark unknown. Mrs. Chesley, in company with Julia Dunn and Mrs. Jos. Glover, made the tour of Europe without any male escort. They were in Paris during the Franco-German war. Mrs. Chesley wrote a number of letters for publication, containing some interesting and graphic descriptions of the scenes attending the siege of Paris.

The death is also announced at Sonoma of Mrs. M. A. Carrager, mother of Mrs. L. L. Lewis and Mrs. A. C. Tufts, of this city. Deceased was 66 years of age and a lady widely known and esteemed. Mrs. Lewis was with her during the last days of her illness, and Mr. Lewis left on Saturday for Sonoma on learning of Mrs. Carrager's death.

Mrs. Sarah J. Osborn, widow of Homer B. Osborn, and a former resident of this city, died in San Francisco on Saturday. Deceased was the mother of Mrs. Caroline Wilsey and sister of C. M. Folger, of this city, also of R. M. and Alexander Folger, of Bridgeport, Mono county.

Ernest, brother of August and Emil Fabian, of this city, died in San Francisco the 24th ult. He was formerly in business here with his brother, but laterly in San Francisco. He was a native of Germany, where his parents still reside.

Shaved While Asleep—Dexterous Eastern Barbers.

In India the Hindoo who shaves you while you are in bed in the morning, carries with him little more than a brush, a razor, and a pair of scissors. He expects to find anything else that may be necessary in your bathroom. You pay him, as you do your other servants, by the month, and he visits you every day, or every alternate day, as may be agreed upon. If he finds you sleeping he never arouses you. He just studies your position, and then shaves only the parts of your face that are plainly exposed to him; and so gently and softly does he do it that unless you are a light sleeper indeed you do not know that you have been lathered and shaved until you open your eyes and see him sitting on the floor beside the bed. Then he makes his salaam, and begs you to turn over so that he can finish his work. But if you are lying upon your back no delay is necessary. He finishes the operation and goes away without disturbing you, and you awake to find yourself shaved without having seen the barber. Your face is probably a little clammy after it, because, of course, he cannot wash it. But as every man in India takes a cold bath the moment he arises from his bed in the morning, that does not greatly matter.

A St. Louis politician who has had some experience says: "Every person has known something of the vexation of being unable to recall a name in a moment of need, and many politicians have failed in business through their inability to remember names. Now, I have a little system of pneumonics to inflict, and think it an effective method of aiding the recollection in such instances. Of course the lost word or name must begin with one of the letters of the alphabet; so you have simply to commence with the letter A, repeating it a number of times slowly and trying to catch the name by aid of its initial letter, going thence down the alphabet, or until the required word is recalled. Sometimes the name comes to you before reaching the letter to which it belongs, but often it appears after the initial has been mentally passed. At any rate it's a good scheme, and has worked admirably with me."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The newest sensation in the drama is the presentation of the Passion Play by Christian Indians in British Columbia, under the auspices of Rev. Father Lacombe.

The telegraph announces the death of the London music composer, Alfred Collier. He, at the time of his death, was engaged on the music of the comic opera, The Monte Banks, the joint work of W. S. Gilbert and himself.

William J. Scanlan has become a mental as well as physical wreck, and is lying at the point of death. One would scarcely believe that a man of his fine frame and active brain could so soon break completely down. He stood foremost as an Irish comedian, and always was a public favorite.

Louise Montague, the once-famous foot-light beauty, has, it is said, abandoned the stage and become an inmate of a convent. This statement has, however, been denied by her friends, who say that she has only retired to rest, and will again appear on the stage within a year. Miss Montague was the most beautiful woman on the stage, and is now only 28 years of age.

The Constellation.

The fact that there is a vessel still in commission in our navy which is almost a hundred years old is not generally known. When the white squadron and the North Atlantic fleet were at New London recently no vessel attracted so much attention as the old sailing frigate Constellation, says the New York Tribune. When it was decided to have a navy the Constellation was the second vessel completed, having been launched into her future element at Baltimore on December 7, 1797. Her first cruise was in European waters, and she was with Captain Stephen Decatur's squadron in the Mediterranean contests of 1805. She was afterward rebuilt, and twelve feet were added to her length, at the East Branch, now Washington, in 1808. When she returned to the United States in 1834, after an extended cruise, she was regarded as one of the finest war ships in the world, both in appearance and seaworthiness. Just before her return to the United States she rode quietly and safely through a terrific storm in the Mediterranean, when a French war ship went down in sight and under its admiral's flag. After another cruise she again returned to the United States and was transferred to the naval academy as a school ship, carrying several classes of cadets on their summer practice cruise, in which service she is now engaged.

The old frigate, which was built of live oak, is a famous old relic and is in excellent condition, considering her age and active service. She is 176 feet in length, 42 feet breadth of beam, 20 feet mean draught, 1,186 tons displacement, and full ship-rigged yards, studding-sail beam and all. Her battery consists of ten eight-inch smooth-bore muzzle-loading guns, two twenty-pounder breech-loading rifles, two twelve-pounder smooth-bore howitzers, one three-inch breech-loading Hotchkiss gun, and one Gatling.

Tree Houses.

The readers of the "Swiss Family Robinson" will remember the famous tree discovered by the children, which was so ingeniously turned into a comfortable home, and a refuge from all possible enemies. Many a boy has thought:

"I would like to have such a home and shelter, but, of course, it is all a fiction, invented to keep up the interest of the story."

A traveler among the islands of the South Pacific, however, says that this style of house is common among the natives. Trees grow there to the height of a hundred feet without a branch, and are then full of large boughs and dense leaves. The natives build houses large enough to accommodate ten or twelve inmates, and stock them with provisions, and with stones and other weapons of defense.

To reach the lower branches from the ground, they make long ladders of creeping vines, which are fastened securely at the top, and may be drawn up quickly at notice of coming danger. They do not usually live in the tree houses, but in huts on the ground. When invaders come from the neighboring islands, they retreat to their lofty homes, where they are secure from danger.

When examining a horse with a view of purchasing, always have him led down a steep or stony descent at the end of a halter with no whip near him. Many horses when brought out of the stable are excited by the presence of strangers, and become still more so at the sight of a whip. A slight lameness may, therefore, be momentarily overlooked by the horse himself, just as a man, under strong excitement, will sometimes forget a sore foot. Leading the horse down a slope will show any defect in his fore quarters, and running him back will develop any weakness that may exist in his hind legs. Horse sharpers know these facts as well as anybody, so if the horse is in the least affected they will generally avoid a hill when showing off a horse to a probable purchaser.

MISCELLANY.

Heat is born of light. Even in the game of poker it is the raise that makes things warm.

The word lady literally means loaf-giver. It is better to call her a woman when you speak of God's fairest.

A Swedish gentleman wears a watch chain made from one of his own ribs, taken from his body by a surgical operation.

A lady in Paris was out of patience and spirits at hearing nothing but French day after day. One morning she heard a cock crowing and exclaimed: "Thank heaven, there's somebody who speaks English."

There are only three places in the world where women possess all the privileges of voting which are accorded to men, viz.: Iceland, Pitcairn Islands and the Isle of Man.

Josephus says, "Antiquities," Book I, chapter 6, section 4, that the son of Arphaxad was Heber, "from whom they originally called the Jews Hebrews." Abraham is the first person called "the Hebrew" in the King James version; in the Septuagint it is perales, and means "the passenger; that is, Abram, the passenger, had lately passed over the River Euphrates. The Encyclopædia Britannica says the word means "crosser," he who has crossed over.

A Lovely Spy.

Some of the most valuable, as well as courageous, secret agents of the south during the war were ladies. Possessing, as many of them did, beauty, finesse, the instinctive knowledge of human nature that enables the sex to penetrate the weakest point of man's armor, and a patriotism that made them proud to assume any risk that would benefit their cause, many undertook missions so desperate that only their womanhood saved them from a short shrift when discovered.

A case in point occurs to me. We had fallen back from Fairfax Court House and gone into camp at Centerville. Winter was at hand, and smoke curled lazily upward from ten thousand clay-built chimneys. Every tree had been leveled by the soldier's ax; the old turnpikes were lost in a labyrinth of foot-worn paths, and fields where only a little while before the wind played hide and seek among the growing corn were now as hard as the bed of a billiard table. The headquarters of Beauregard were in a farmhouse, unpainted and unpretentious, that once had been the home of famous Virginia hospitality, but "the boys had gone to the war," the old folks had retired to more congenial scenes in the interior of the state, and all around were signs of ruin.

The plans of McClellan, whose army was encamped in our front, his fighting strength and the disposition of his forces, together with the new phase of public sentiment in the north that was then beginning to take shape, were at this time subjects of grave concern to our commander, and it was important to obtain more definite information than had been furnished by the regular spies. How to get it, however, and through whom, was the question.

The problem was solved while at breakfast one morning by a member of Beauregard's staff. "I know a lady," he said, "in the neighboring county of Loudon, who possesses every qualification of a successful secret agent. Her name is Mrs. Virginia Mason. She is young, fascinating, highly educated, a welcome guest in many Washington families, and acquainted with a large number of northern people who spent their winters in the capital before the war. Withal, she is a widow, her husband having been killed at the battle of Manassas, and brave enough to undertake anything that will serve the land she loves."

Beauregard instructed the officer to ride over to Loudon and invite the lady to visit headquarters, and in a day or two she appeared. In the interview that followed he told her what he required—a report from McClellan's army; its condition, the disposition of its forces, and the plans discussed by the military authorities in Washington. For this purpose she was to ingratiate herself with prominent officers, visit New York, Baltimore, the various departments, or any other points where information could be procured. She was also to communicate with the representatives of the confederate government in different cities of the north.

The lady eagerly accepted the proposition, and, supplied with an abundance of money, started at once on the perilous errand, which meant glory if she was successful, and prison if she failed. She returned after an absence of several weeks, crossing the Potomac opposite Dumfries, and arrived at the camp of colonel, now senator, Wade Hampton. Thence, escorted by one of his officers, she was driven to headquarters at Centerville.

I can see her now as she alighted from the ambulance on the piazza of the little, brown farmhouse; a young, but matronly looking lady; handsome, too, with glowing dark eyes, that looked as if they had fireworks in them. She was dressed in black, and her only baggage was a small hand satchel. She was also accompanied by a shaggy Skye terrier, a mere animal, that made a soldier who hadn't seen a pretty woman for a month of Sundays envious.

What occurred within the doors that closed upon her was related to me afterward by General Jordan, then and subsequently Beauregard's adjutant general. Beauregard was, of course, delighted to see her, and, with a woman's volubility, she told him more in two hours than he could remember in two months. The verbal part of the interview being ended, he inquired for her papers, the record of her trip, and the dispatches he expected from confederates in the north.

"Why, general, I didn't dare to bring them on my person," she replied, with a peculiar smile. "It was unsafe, you know; I might have been captured; and therefore I have told you all I know by word of mouth."

Beauregard could not conceal his vexation, and the more he showed it the more the little woman seemed to enjoy it. Finally, after teasing him to her heart's content, she said with affected demureness, "General, have you a pair of scissors or a knife? I'd like to use it for a minute?"

Beauregard handed her the ink eraser. "Come here, Dot," she called to the dog, and taking him in her lap continued: "I told you, General, it was not safe to carry important papers on my person and I have not done so; in fact, I have been suspected and searched, but a woman's wit is sometimes superior to a man's judgment. See?" she said with coquettish nonchalance, as she turned the little animal on its back and deliberately proceeded to rip him open. "Here are the dispatches!"

As she spoke she held in one hand the hide of her Skye terrier and with the other smilingly extended a package of closely written tissue paper, while dancing about the floor was a pretty "black and tan," happy at his deliverance from another dog's clothes. The deception was perfect, the mission a success. Beauregard was enabled to anticipate McClellan's movements, and the charming spy not only received a handsome reward, but was led to the altar after the war as the bride of the young officer who sang her praises at Beauregard's breakfast table.

Mrs. Mason afterward engaged in a number of perilous enterprises, visiting the north several times and once running the blockade from Charleston with the Captain "Bob" Lockwood, so long indentified with the New York and Charleston line of steamers. Whether she is still alive I do not know.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of ten cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. KATIE E. CLARK.

The Art of Dining.

A writer abroad tells us that "no table in the whole world is served so daintily or artistically as that of the Austrian court." Priceless porcelain, unique crystal and glass and antique gold and silver plate are used. "The damask is so fine that it looks like satin, and this is replaced for lunch and afternoon teas by a heavy white silk cloth and napkins edged with point de Venice and adorned with the imperial crest raised in gold embroidery."

The viands are prepared so beautifully by the artist of the imperial kitchen that it seems too bad to eat them.

At a dinner given some time ago at the Hofburg, in Vienna, in honor of the king and queen of Italy, luxury and exquisite taste were combined. "The cloth was covered with violets nestling so close to one another that they formed a perfect bank of fragrant blossoms, leaving just room for the plates of semi-transparent Sevres, of the famille rose, each of which was surrounded with a thick garland of marguerites. Marguerite being the Christian name of the Queen of Italy, her little namesake had been used with great profusion. Before each plate was a slender tulip-shaped vase of Venetian glass, mounted in finely-wrought gold, containing a bouquet of marguerites and violets, powdered with diamond dust. The menus were engraved on thin sheets of hammered silver, with the Austrian eagle embossed on the corner. Everything was served on gold dishes, and the dessert plates were marvels of beauty.

Mr. Edmond Russell described in one of his lectures a tablecloth owned by Mrs. Felix Moscheles, of London, which is composed of bits of old German embroidery on white linen, the pieces being of irregular size, fastened together by old lace insertion, some of the lace being many centuries old.

"The Moscheles dining-room opens from the studio, and when not in use the table is usually covered with several large jars of blossoming plants, azaleas in bloom, rhododendrons, or jars of lilies, while the light comes from the side through a large window of opalescent glass and Mexican onyx."

The most valuable dinner set in the world is said to belong to Queen Victoria. It fills two rooms in Buckingham palace, and is guarded by two men continually. Mrs. Wm. Astor has a gold dinner service valued at $50,000, and the service, in lion and unicorn repousse work, is used upon the finest of white linen cloths bordered with lace, showing a tint through its meshes of the shade of gloire de Paris roses which are used for the table decorations. At a recent dinner party given by Mrs. Astor covers were laid for twenty-six guests. "The table was covered with a cloth of Italian lace and pink satin, the decorations were Catharine Mermet roses and maidenhair ferns. It was set with the Astor silver service, including high candelabra and small candlesticks. Pink satin shades were used for the candles."

A novel idea in menu cards was recently introduced by a hostess who had traveled much abroad. She had a fine collection of souvenirs and pressed flowers and grasses. These she mounted on cards, with the name, date, etc., and an appropriate quotation. "Mrs. Leland Stanford recently paid $85 for fifty cards to be used as menus for one of her big dinners. The map of the United States was stamped in silver on each card, and the drawings and engravings were exquisite."

Dinner favors in flower designs are very popular. Rose leaves are found in two colors, pink and yellow, and sell for $1 per dozen. Lily leaves retail for $1.25 per dozen. Orchids sell for $4 per dozen. Dinner favors are also made in designs of green pea pods. Another unique one is a birch chip, and still another is a feather. The last three styles cost 75 cents per dozen.

Yellow dinners and teas are still popular. At one the table was covered with a cloth of yellow satin and rare Brussels lace. The silver bowls at the center and corners were filled with yellow chrysanthemums and roses. At another the cover was a pale yellow silk, embroidered in sphinx heads. The china was yellow.—The Housekeeper.

"Old Hickory" was not the beau ideal of politeness, yet they tell a story of his treatment of Davy Crockett which throws new light on the delicacy of the hero of New Orleans. It was while Jackson was president that Crockett paid his respects at the white house. "The president was glad to see me, and we talked a long time," said Crockett afterward, narrating the incident, "and finally the general asked me if I wouldn't like to have a drink, saying that he had a fine brand that was the real old stuff; and of course I couldn't refuse the president. So he went and brought it out, and he didn't pour out a drink and hand it to me, and he didn't tell me to pour out one. He didn't bring out any glasses at all; but in genuine, good old true Texan style, he handed me the demijohn and then turned his back, and I swung it upon my arm and began to pull at it. Such liquor I had never tasted, and I couldn't let go for a long time, but the president never turned around until I said 'Bob,' and I tell you that is what I call real true genuine politeness, and that is why I say that old Gen. Jackson was the politest man I ever knew."

Our neighbor, the Record-Union, editorially discusses the question of diplomatic asylum. During the Barundia affair we took occasion to examine our diplomatic rulings on the right of asylum, and later to call attention to the action of the late international American conference relating to uniform treaties, including the right of asylum. The rules in vogue prior to the adoption of the system laid down by the late conference were as stated by the Record-Union, but under report adopted in July, 1890, it seems that there is a clearly defined policy, which provides that the right of asylum is inviolable for political offenders, and that political offenders seeking for shelter at a legation, the legation shall be an asylum, and shall be respected as such. The head of the legation shall give notice of all refugees to the home government, and said government shall have the power to demand that the refugees be sent away from the national territory in the shortest possible time, and a proper guarantee shall be given for the exit of the offenders without injury to the inviolability of their persons. Chile was one of the countries represented in the Pan-American Conference which adopted these rules for asylum. There can be no question, therefore, under these rules, of the right of Minister Egan to protect the political offenders who sought asylum in the American legation, and that he has a right to demand their exit without harm from the Chilean government.

Since the creation of man, the beauty of woman has always been considered something to worship. It is part of man's nature to reverence woman's beauty. Recently an eminent divine of New York, Bishop Potter, has, in his position as a teacher of divinity, declared that the beauty of woman is the cause of, and leads to, wickedness. With him this beauty is a thing undesirable to cultivate. If we are to draw a veil over this divine attribute of our sisters, then, indeed, life would not be worth the living. While this gift of the gods to our fair sisters may often lead to wickedness, it must be said that a beautiful woman can be distinguished for the highest nobility of character. It is part of woman's nature to not only be lovely, but to create loveliness in the character of others. All the bishops in the world cannot make us believe that loveliness in woman is not the great redeeming feature of man's existence. All beautiful women are not like the straight-nosed Helen of Troy.

The wonderful psychic power is again commanding the earnest attention of scientists and the medical profession. For many years writers of fiction have made the hypnotic influence and psychic power important factors of romance. Hawthorne, Balzac, Dumas, and many other distinguished authors have found animal magnetism fruitful sources for the most sensational romances. While this is a practical age, and we are much given to skepticism on all things of a supernatural or unexplainable character, this psychic power we are now forced to concede—the proofs are so clear, so commulative that it cannot be gainsaid. To the religionist it is an explanation of much of the apparent miraculous and fabulous of holy writ. The laying on of hands and faith cures find an argument in their behalf through the medium of the discovery of Mesmer a century ago, now more fully developed on hypnoticism. What was in the middle ages considered supernatural and the power of the devil, is now an approved mental science. Through this power the mystery of our existence is likely to be solved. The orthodox christian can find a way through the psychic to explain the miracles of the Saviour. Hypnotism is no new phenomenon. It has been known to the oriental world for thousands of years. It was through this power that the ancient soothsayers performed their wonderful divinations. The Persian mayi and learned physicians of the east utilized this power, possibly without a knowledge of its origin.

Modern hypnotism is a development of animal magnetism, the discovery of Mesmer, a Viennese physician of the last century, and which was making great progress as a science until the frauds and mummeries of its professed adepts threw it into disrepute. In 1841, a quarter of a century after Mesmer's death, James Brand, an English surgeon, began to investigate the subject. He it was who named the state induced by fixing the eyes on one object, hypnosis, and the science, hypnotism. The two leading principles of hypnotism are these: (1) "There are certain human beings who can exercise a personal influence over others." (2) "Particular psychological states can be induced in certain human beings by certain psychical processes." In 1860 French scientists began a thorough investigation of this occult force. When, in 1874, the subject was taken up by the French medical school at Nancy, interest in it became general. In both Europe and America societies for psychical research make hypnotism one of their studies. In 1889, a hypnotic congress, attended by delegates from all over the world, was held in Paris. The science has passed the stage of ridicule and alleged imposture. All persons are not susceptible to hypnotization, but such as succumb to its influence, are for the time being automata, swayed by a power and will outside their own. In view of dangers arising from the abuse of this power, it is claimed that for the present, it should be legal only to physicians, as an agent in surgery and the cure of disease. Science has not as yet fathomed the subtler relations of mind and body. As far as it understands hypnotic phenomena, it declares that they result from physiological conditions. Hypnotism has battled for its recognition for a century against the cry of the skeptic, but at length it has become an acknowledged scientific fact. Medical men claim for it a place in their profession for the good of humanity. The most difficult thing for a man to understand is himself. The wonderful machine of brain and muscle is still a mystery, but the solution may be found in the psychic temple.

The postmaster-general's report for the past fiscal year is replete with information on all postal matters. His ideas are advanced to the requirements of the country, and many valuable improvements are suggested. It is apparent this officer has given, and is giving, great attention to the details of his department, and has bestowed more thought upon the subject than any of his predecessors. He thinks that newspapers could be carried free, if books alleged to be periodicals were properly classified, and sample copies of newspapers, except to a reasonable number, were classified as any other merchandise. The increased revenue would more than equal the total amount now collected from publishers for postage of newspapers. In other words, the department would suffer no loss by carrying newspapers to actual subscribers free, if it received just pay for the serials and sample copies. The department now handles over one hundred millions annually of the people's money in the money-order transfers, and is thoroughly equipped to take charge of the small savings of the people. The scheme of postal savings banks, or deposits, is strongly urged by the postmaster-general. He calls upon the learned men in congress to study this matter of postal savings, in order that proper legislation may follow. Mr. Wanamaker is an earnest votary and advocate of the postal telegraph as well as postal telephone service. He says the electric current belongs to the people by right and is bound to become their servant; not of a class nor of one sixty-fourth of the population, as at present. So soon as the postoffice can blend it with its own system, and use its own forces already under pay, telegraphic rates will be reduced. The telegraph and telephone, both of which by their very nature are limited to the service of cheap and rapid exchange of communication between the people; and this is what the postoffice was founded for. A branch dead letter office is recommended for San Francisco. The states and territories of the Pacific slope are so far from the seat of government that they almost constitute a distinct postal section. This fact entails delay and inconvenience in the transaction of business. There is no reason why mail matter imperfectly addressed or otherwise unmailable should always be sent to Washington, and there be reshipped across the continent, to be returned to senders. It would be economy to establish a dead-letter office west of the Rocky mountains, and San Francisco is the proper place. There is much carelessness in publishers in sending their large volumes of mail. The wrappers are often of printed matter, with the addresses so imperfect that postal clerks cannot decipher them. This causes a loss to the government, as well as much trouble and annoyance to patrons of the newspapers, who, by this carelessness of the senders, make complaint against the postal service. Nine letters of every ten that go wrong do so because of the carelessness of the senders. Thirty-eight years ago the total receipts of the department did not equal the receipts to-day of the postoffice in one city. In 1853 the entire receipts were $5,940,725, and to-day the revenue at New York city alone is $6,386,520. With the annual report there is an appendix, giving some valuable information in the details of the department. Much attention has been given to rural free delivery, and there are forty-six communities where the experiment is being tried. Even the political enemies of Postmaster-General Wanamaker must concede that he has done more for the postal service than any who has gone before.

Last Saturday the Daily Evening Bee was 36 years old. As we have taken occasion to say heretofore, the Bee is a part of the state, and its pages constitute the history of California from the earliest American settlement—always bold and aggressive in matters of public import. In the several departments of this popular journal can be found the choicest literature, art, science, drama, and above all, the news. The present managers and proprietors inherit the spirit that characterized their father, James McClatchy, the founder of the paper. No obstacle can thwart them in securing the first and best accounts of all matters of news, even at the risk of life and limb amid the Sierra snows. While we may not at all times agree with all the principles avowed, there is at least a consistency in their zeal and energy. The city, the county, the state could not spare this journal. It is part of the community and as fixed as the pillars of Hercules.

Sacramento is essentially a "me, too" town. Whenever other towns in the state start out to do anything that shows enterprise or respect for themselves, Sacramento comes trotting along in the distance, the dust blinding her, and in a piping whine she cries out, "Me, too!—me, too!" President Harrison came to California. All the villages below us prepared and received him. Sacramento awoke when he was almost within our borders, and then succeeded in getting his company for a couple of hours. The National Press Association is coming this way, and Sacramento begins to bawl out "Me, too!" and is trying to have the gentlemen change their "itinerary" (they had better be cautious what they change in this season of the grip) so that they may be able to write up the fact, when they get back home, that they got off the train at Sacramento. Auburn, little village of the foothills, is doing as much, and don't have to ask them to change nary "itinerary" nor a twenty.

A Spell of Blues.

Say, do you ever get the blues, the reg'lar old stem-winding kind,
When nothing here nor nowhere else is what you want, and you get blind
To every mortal blessing that the Lord has sent you here below—
When all the flowers seem to fade and only weeds and thistles grow?

A man can't tell just why he feels so mighty lonesome-like at times—
Why everything is jangled so, and not a thing in nature rhymes.
You're neither sick nor well, a sort of weak and weary half and half;
You don't feel bad enough to cry, and yet you wouldn't dare to laugh.

The birds all seem to sing in some shrill compass not at all their own,
And brooks go babbling in a sad and melancholly undertone,
And everything's as miserable as breaking in a new pair shoes,
While pleasure turns her face away from him who has a spell of blues.

The sun may shine and yet you see a gloomy shadow everywhere,
And meadows full of clover all look very lonesome-like and bare.
A sad and misty far-away of sorrow kind of dims the eyes;
You're just chock full of misery and wouldn't have it otherwise.

It isn't very often that I get a spell of feeling bad.
Because to me life is a joy and nearly all my days are glad;
But I have sympathy for those who now and then their sunshine lose,
Who just sit down and bite their thumb and cultivate a spell of blues.

Stories of Jim Fisk.

In his halcyon days Jim Fisk was a dandy without a blemish—I mean so far as liberality goes. If ever a man cared nothing for money that man was Jim Fisk. Jay Gould was more of a man Friday than a factotum. No person in Gould's employ is more dependent or obsequious than was Gould himself twenty-three years ago. Both were peddlers, you know; but Fisk made dollars where Gould made dimes. I shall never forget a bit of correspondence between Fisk and an actress, whom I won't name. Mr. Fisk telegraphed the actress as follows, as nearly as I can remember: "What are your terms to play Miranda until the arrival of Miss Fiddes?" Of course, she had sized up Jim pecuniarily more than mentally, and replied: "One thousand dollars a week, one-third of the house clear once a week, $1,000 to break an engagement in St. Louis and railroad expenses for three people from New Orleans to New York." To which Fisk replied: "Madame, your terms are much too low. You shall have all the money that comes into the box office, and I will present you with the opera house and 200 miles of the Erie railway, besides all I have accumulated in a life of toil and self-denial; also all that I may make for the next five years, which, if I may judge from the past, will be no inconsiderable amount. If these terms should not meet with your approbation it may be possible for me to make Gould give up what little he has, so that the light of your refulgent genius may not be lost to the stage."

Fisk is the author of "gone where the woodbine twineth." Fetching and lasting, don't you see? He was the first to uniform railway and steamboat men in authority, and was laughed at. But at present all persons in authority, from master of steamboats down to street-car conductors and messenger boys, display some insignia of rank or calling. We are indebted to Jim Fisk for this.—Chicago Tribune.

A TRUE STORY.

In the year 1822 a flatboat reached New Orleans from Louisville, Ky., and from this flatboat, at about 2 o'clock in the night, a poorly-clad boy of fourteen stealthily crept ashore and made his way into a dark alley. He was running off from a brutal master to whom he had been bound some six months before. John Shadden was an orphan all alone in the world, so far as worthy or even respectable kinsfolk went, and his life had recently been almost unbearably hard. His master treated him as if he had been a negro slave; nay, worse than most slave-owners could afford to treat their human property.

The journey down the river had been protracted, toilsome and full of torture for both the mind and body of the poor boy, who was made to work a long, heavy oar, the task of a strong man. Besides this he had been beaten unmercifully every day, and given but poor food and worse clothing. It rained during the final week of the journey, and John was drenched from morning till night. Although the weather was not cold, as March weather usually is in our more northern regions, the southern wind that blew over the river was singularly chilly and searching.

John had borne all that he could, and now he was desperate, determined indeed to take himself and his future into his own hands, no matter what might come of it. He would starve in the streets of New Orleans rather than to suffer another day under Hiram Gunter's hand.

He ran along the alley as fast as he could, for he feared pursuit, thinking of nothing so much as losing himself in the maze of the great city, and while at his highest speed he turned a corner into a dimly-lighted street, where he ran plump against an absurdly short and almost comically hump-backed little man, who grabbed him with what felt like the grip of a giant, and began to berate him roundly in French.

John was too much frightened to make outcry, and he could not understand a word of what the fellow was saying to him, so he just stood there trembling all over. All that he could do was to grasp forth: "Let go er me!"

John was uneducated, and having been reared, or rather let come up, among negroes and "river rats" and laborers on the wharves, spoke with a decided negro drawl.

"What for you run ovair ze top o' me?" demanded the little man, now speaking the best English at his command, and tightening his grip on John. "Eef you have not ze good sense I choke some into you."

John began to beg and explain. He frankly told his story, crying at the same time. The dwarf held on to him, but presently relaxed his hold enough to greatly lessen the pain of it while he turned John's face around so that he could see it better in the vague light of a distant lamp. "So you make ze run f'om you master, eh? Vell, zat is goot; I nevaire blame you. Come 'long vit me."

He pulled John over to the shadowy side of the street and urged him along. They traversed damp, pitch-dark alleys and narrow, evil-smelling streets; they wound in and out through squalid, ill-drained quarters. Once a policeman stopped them. "Hello, there, Crapaud Crapoussin!" he said, "what are you doing with that boy?"

"He's my nigger," answered the dwarf, promptly; speaking in French as had also the officer. "He's been running off, and I am taking him home to thrash him."

"Good for you, Crapaud," said the policeman, sauntering on, "give it to him till he won't do it again."

In a little while John and his captor came to a hole in the wall surrounding a large, dilapidated building. Crapaud stopped here and said to John, in a growling whisper: "Eef you make contraire an' cry varee loud I keel you! so now."

Then he dragged the almost fainting lad into the foul hole and up a rickety flight of stairs to a room where an old, old woman was knitting. "I've bought another nigger," he said to her in French.

"Stole him, you mean," was the response, in a cracked and evil-sounding voice.

John, of course, could not understand a word that they said; but the little, shriveled, black-eyed crone looked at him with an expression that chilled his blood and caused his flesh to creep on his bones. Crapaud had kept his hold on John, and now he took him to a small, closet-like room that opened into the one they had just entered.

"Ees you my neegaire?" he demanded, very softly. "I'm not no nigger," said John. In spite of his fear he promptly resented the imputation.

Crapaud took down from the smoky wall a long, keen whip and proceeded to thrash him soundly. John tried to scream; but the old woman sprang upon him and held his mouth. "I'll jes wheep you all ze night time eef you make ze noise," growled Crapaud, laying on the blows with increasing violence. "My neegaire not yowl zat way."

After receiving this terrible punishment, for what he could not imagine, John was tumbled into the stuffy, filthy little room and there left. When the bolt of the door grated in its loops he held his breath and dared not even groan.

The next morning Crapaud opened the door and asked him the same question again—"Ees you my neegaire?"

"Oh, sah," pleaded John, "I ain't no nigger."

Immediately down came the whip; and this second thrashing was worse than the first. "Now zen, what you say? Ees you my neegaire?"

John was glad enough to say yes. It were better to be a negro than bear such torture.

"Ah, vell; come have some dejeuner, some breakfais, zen."

He was given a pot of food, such as he had never before tasted, but he was so hungry that he found it delicious.

After this he was to all intents and purposes a negro; he did not dare be anything else. Crapaud and his mother were very good to him so long as he did not in any way assert his whiteness; but at the first hint of this came the whip in such terrible fashion that it made him sick even to remember that he had ever been white.

A month went on so, and then one day Crapaud said to John: "Come!"

They went to a place where a man had a great number of negroes in a large room or shed. "What will you give for the boy?" said Crapaud to the man.

The negro buyer looked at John, took him by the arm, shook him a little and turned him about; then said: "Not much account; worth 250, if he's sound."

"Oh, he's as sound as a dollar; examine him."

The man felt of John's limbs. "Well, will you take 250?"

"No; 350."

"Bah! say 275."

The bargain was struck at $300. John did not understand what the men were saying; it was all French; but he soon realized that he was sold.

For eight days he was kept there among the crowded negroes, and taken up the river to St. James' parish and sold again to a planter, who wanted him for a house servant. John was a tawny-skinned, black-eyed, curly-headed boy, but he did not look like a negro. After he had been in the house for a week or two, his complexion cleared up, and all the planter's household were surprised to see how handsome he was. They treated him well, but he was afraid to tell them that he was white, for fear that they would follow Crapaud's example. It was his business to mop floors, clean silverware and black boots. So much easier was all this to do than what he had been used to, and all the planter's family were so kind to him, that he found being a slave better than the old state of freedom; still, he yearned to be known as a white boy, and pined, in spite of himself, for liberty, even with the flatboat and his villainous bondmaster.

He thought of running off, but his owners were so kind that his heart would not let him leave them.

In less than a year a thing came which changed his feelings on this score. The planter became bankrupt and all of his property went to the sheriff's block. He now told his story, but there was no proof, and who would believe it?

The auctioneer stood by and "cried the sale." "A fine mulatto boy, strong, active, good-natured; a most excellent house servant. Going for $420. Who says more? Going—go—"

"Four twenty-five!" shouted a keen yet singularly soft voice.

John started and gazed hard, for it was Crapaud Crapoussin who bid.

A despicable look was on the dwarf's drawn face. His eyes leered villainously.

"Going, going, going, at 425; and are you all done bidding?" cried the red-faced auctioneer. "Going, going, gone to Crapaud Crapoussin for $425." And so John went back to the stuffy little rooms in New Orleans, once more the slave of the little hunchback. His spirit broke down entirely as he crossed that terrible threshold.

He was not to remain there long. Crapaud took him almost immediately to the river, and they went on board a steamboat bound for Louisville, where they arrived after many days. From the wharf they went at once to a lawyer's office.

"Here's the lad; yere ees ze leetle boy—ze leetle Zohn Shadden. Pay me ze money," said Crapaud.

"Certainly; when the proof is made," responded the lawyer, "the reward is ready for you."

It was queer all round, for the outcome made John the heir to about $7,000, the estate of a mean and miserly uncle recently dead. Crapaud had seen in the newspapers that the lawyer was offering $1,000 reward for the boy. His knowledge of John's past life, as related to him by the boy himself, had led him to take this daring step with a view to gaining the reward.

Was it right or wrong? The lawyer, instead of paying Crapaud, had him arrested and convicted for kidnapping, and he served a number of years in the state's prison.

John Shadden grew up an honest and industrious man. His descendants live in Louisville and Covington.

Queen Victoria's crown, kept with other royal regalia under strong guard at the old Tower, is worth $600,000.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The pretty pianist always has a striking manner, and more frequently a distracting air.

Joseph J. Sullivan and Harry Smith will star next season in a comedy entitled Bill's Boat.

Frederick Paulding, who was with Margaret Mather when last in this city, will star in The Fool's Revenge and Honeymoon.

Vernona Jarbeau was presented with a gold badge by the Alabama Fire Company, No. 2, in Montgomery, Ala., recently.

Mrs. Sidney Drew is traveling about the country and acting, with her twelve weeks' old baby. Miss baby is fat and jolly and well and is a rising star in the dramatic world.

He—I hear you attend the Handel and Haydn performances. Were you present at the Creation? She (indignantly)—I suppose you will next want to know if I sailed in Noah's Ark!

A pen sketch of Marie Van Zandt, the prima donna, portrays her as "a slender, girlish figure, with a little, round face, an upward-turned nose, small, blue eyes and chestnut hair." She is "little, but oh my!" as her audiences in Paris and St. Petersburg discovered to their great interest.

Actors are proverbially charitable. Ellen Terry and Bernhardt, profiting from repeated impositions, now entrust their charity to friends. Perhaps this liberality is why doctors are so adverse to sending bills to theatrical people. Sir Morell MacKenzie always refuses recompense for treating them.

The New York Dramatic Mirror says: "There is at the present time a movement on foot to establish an association of traveling managers. The idea is to compel theater managers out of town to remove the abuses which have played havoc with business, by bringing to bear the pressure of a cohesive, protective union."

It is nearly twenty years since the tenor Capoul came to America with Christine Nilsson on her first operatic tour and jumped into immediate popularity with American audiences. He is now but little changed in personal appearance, except that he has grown a trifle stout and there is a trace of gray in his hair. But he is as courtly, as graceful and as fascinating to women, as he was of yore.

As early as 1811 Lord Byron entered a plea against the farce-comedy microbe as follows:

"Good plays are scarce,
So Moore writes farce.
The poet's fame grows brittle;
We knew before
That Little's Moore,
But now 'tis Moore that's little."
—N. Y. Dramatic Mirror.

When an actress makes a dab at her right eye with the middle finger of her right hand, followed by a show of throwing something into space, and then repeats this performance with respect to her left eye, it signifies that she is indulging in tears. When an actor writes a letter he does it with a rapidity which causes the most expert of stenographers to turn green with envy. When an actor opens a letter he invariably gives the unfolded sheet a smart slap with the back of his hand. He does this for the good and sufficient reason that all actors have done this since time immemorial. When an actress has something particular to confide to her papa or mamma, it would be the height of ill manners did she not crouch down on the floor by the side of her parent. When an actor enters into confidential conversation with another actor, it is the proper thing for him to hang his leg over the back of a chair, with his foot resting in its seat. When an actor walks up to the footlights and declaims in a loud voice to the audience, it is understood that he is soliloquizing, quite unbeknownst to the other people on the stage. When an actor comes on the stage faultlessly dressed, with a flower in his buttonhole, you may be sure that he is a villain of the deepest dye. When an actor has all manner of hard luck, and is seedy as to clothing and chronically empty as to stomach, he is to be congratulated, for he is shortly to wed the young lady of his choice and to arise by a spasmodic bound to affluence. When an actor slaps his leg now and again, it is to inform you that he is in the equestrian line. When an actor walks to the room represented on the stage and gawks at the pictures on the wall, you may know either that he is from the country or that he is a sheriff's officer. If his hat is of remote vintage, and he persists in keeping it on his head, you may safely set him down as the latter. When an actress enters with a stern step and a top-lofty air, you need not be told that she is a mother-in-law. When a wicked-looking actor beats his brow, it is to inform you that he is thinking of childhood's hour, when he was guileless and happy and a stranger to the sin in which he is now steeped.—Boston Courier.

Book Chat.

Even the illiterate man finds pleasure in a book—if it's a plump pocketbook.

Ernest Renan does not personally maintain the air of dignity inspired by his writings. He is short and pudgy.

Prof. Simon Newcomb is making arrangements for the publication of a forecast of the positions of the planets in the heavens for the next century.

Amelia Rives-Chandler is putting herself into the hands of a French art teacher, and intends to study for five months each year for ten years before she makes her debut.

Prof. Curtius, the eminent Greek scholar on whom the kaiser has bestowed high honors, is said to be the most accomplished Helenist since the days of Helen of Troy. He is reputed to know more about Greece than the average Greek of Pericles' time knew himself.

Sir Edwin Arnold calls Edgar Allen Poe "the Catullus of American literature," and thinks he should be better appreciated by the reading public than he is. Tennyson, too, not very long ago, said the most interesting spot he would visit, were he to go to America, would be "the provincial town of Baltimore, where he could go and see the grave of Poe."

Unfortunately a disinclination to matrimony is being evinced by the youth of France, and we are convinced that it is to the terrible spread of immoral literature that the mischief is to be ascribed. Pollute the mind and you corrupt the heart. There is nothing that soils the soul more than a licentious novel or poem. "Vices are the children of those that have no children." If a country would maintain its greatness it must promote by every means at its command the purity, the integrity and the indissolubility of family life.

Sir Edwin Arnold is an admirer of Zola's genius. He says that "La Bête Humaine" is the best book of the year. He says: "I must acknowledge, and do acknowledge, the marvelous power of this great master of fiction. Zola's theory of human life is detestable; his choice of subjects is repulsive; his treatment of them is too often needlessly and aggressively coarse and offensive; and he exaggerates to the point of monstrosity the evil in humanity at the expense of the good. His study is a dissecting-room, where nothing interests or engages that poisoned scalpel, his pen, except the cadaverous and the diseased. Even allowing all the importance he claims for this great and well-established principle of heredity, it is still the case that good is as much inherited as bad, and is so vastly a predominating force in the universe that in the working of these two rival principles nature is always rooting out and healing the inherited evil. M. Zola forgets, or for the purpose of his art ignores, the fact that virtuous propensities are bequeathed from generation to generation, as well as vicious. As far as human life is concerned, and its true study, we might as well take the incurable ward in a great hospital as a specimen of the daily existence of mankind, and leave utterly out of sight the pure and happy homes, the bright society, the glad and graceful intercourse, the countless unrecorded brave and unselfish deeds, the gentle general flow of human existence. * * * Taints of hereditary insanity do affect the blood, and sin and selfishness and wild, low passions do exist among us too widely and too palpably to be ignored; and I am not one of those who would for one moment deny to M. Zola the right to choose these sombre themes for his extraordinary art. I do not even think his books immoral."

"Billy" Birch's Joke.

"When I was playing in luck," said Billy Birch, the old minstrel landmark familiar to the habitués of upper Broadway, "the impecunious crowd that used to hang around the stage door for a stray dime, or a quarter, struck me pretty often. Some were pretty smart fellows and always had a word of flattery for those who were kind to them. Now, that I am old and down in the world, I do not regret anything I gave away. One night an old actor who was seedy and down on his luck touched me for a quarter. He was a very bright and hungry fellow, and after thanking me profusely went off to get something to eat—or drink. In about half an hour he came back and found me with some fellows. He came right up, with a broad smile on his face, and tapping me on the shoulder said to the crowd:

"Here's that quarter, Billy. It was a mighty good joke and I tried to work it on the barkeeper around the block, but it wouldn't go. Then I tried it on a lunch route and the man actually got mad and would have thrown me out if I hadn't told him you gave it to me. He said then it was one of your jokes. A confoundedly good joke it was, too," said he, "for I got a drink and a meal out of it. And now here, your quarter; give me a good one, please, for advertising you."

"Everybody laughed as I gave him another quarter and took the bad one back, and nobody would believe it was anything but a practical joke of mine."

Andrew H. Burke, the present governor of North Dakota, was once a newsboy. It was by selling "extras" that he began his extraordinary rise in life. Ex-Governor Waller, of Connecticut, also began as a newsboy.

Daniel Webster was something of a granger in his day, though he didn't run his politics largely on that fact. A plow used by him has come into the possession of the Marshfield, Mass., agricultural society, and may be exhibited at the world's fair.

A young woman of pleasing figure, with a rich contralto voice, large, expressive eyes and a sweet face, well lit with animation, made her appearance in this city last evening as a dramatic star, and, judging by her performance, she is clearly entitled to that distinction in the firmament so often sought by many and yet found by few.—The Evening Herald Philadelphia. Who is she? We have not heard of any prominent society lady getting into a scandal or divorce.

Robert Carrick, a wealthy banker of Glasgow, was noted for his frugality. One day a friend, meeting him in the streets of Glasgow, noticed his old clothes and advised him to get a new suit. "Everybody knows me here, so it doesn't matter what I wear," answered the banker. A few weeks afterward the friend met the banker in London, wearing the same old clothes, and again remonstrated with him for dressing so shabbily. "No one knows me here, so it doesn't matter what I wear," said the philosophic banker.

A famous Brooklyn clergyman was once addressing a Sunday-school on the lesson of the day, which happened to be "Jacob's Ladder." He got along swimmingly until a little urchin in one of the back seats squeaked out, "Why did the angels have to have a ladder, when they had wings?" After the inevitable laugh had subsided, the clergyman said: "Well, that is a fair question. Who can answer it?" There was a pause, and then up went a pudgy fist. "Well, my little man," asked the clergyman, "why was it?" "I guess, mebbe, they was a-moultin'" was the astonishing reply; and the address was concluded right there.

The following dream story is related of a distinguished Scottish lawyer: "This eminent person had been consulted respecting a case of great importance and much difficulty; and he had been studying it with intense anxiety and attention. After several days had been occupied in this manner, he was observed by his wife to rise from his bed in the night, and go to a writing desk which stood in the bedroom. He then sat down, and wrote a long paper which he carefully put by in his desk, and returned to bed. The following morning he told his wife that he had had a most interesting dream: that he had dreamt of delivering a clear and luminous opinion respecting a case which had exceedingly perplexed him; and that he would give anything to recover the train of thought which had passed before him in his dream. She then directed him to the writing desk, where he found the opinion clearly and fully written out; and this was afterwards found to be perfectly correct."

An Indian Legend.:

There was once a man who lived in the forest far from the rest of his tribe. He lost his wife and was very lonely. After awhile he made a wooden doll about her size, dressed it in the clothes she used to wear and set it up in front of the fireplace. Then he felt better. So a year passed away. One night he came home and there was his wife sitting in a chair in place of the doll. She spoke to him, saying, "The Great Spirit felt sorry for you, so he let me come back to see you, but you must never touch me, for if you do it will kill me." They lived thus together for a twelve-month, but one night he attempted to clasp her in his arms. Behold, he was holding a wooden doll! She did not come to life again, and he was very unhappy ever after.

NOTES.

The man who says he will welcome death as a release from a life made up of sorrow, generally sends for four doctors when he has the colic.

The faith-cure converts declare that there is no such thing as "the grip," if you will persistently think so. This is a pleasant theory, and will work admirably until the grip takes hold.

Wonder if Sacramento intends to take a hand in trying to have a share of that three hundred thousand dollars voted by the last legislature to enable California to show herself at the Columbian Exposition?

Quite the most ridiculous of present styles is where a woman with rather a long face carries her hair high and arranges it in a flat pug on a line diagonally with her chin. If, then, she perches above this a small English turban she does look queer indeed.

It is confidentially rumored about town that the city trustees held their customary weekly meeting last Monday and adjourned without a blackguard word or profane expression having been indulged in between the members. However, the report is only "hearsay," and lacks confirmation.

We often hear of whisky that will kill a rod and think it strong, but what must we say of the "fine old whisky," so labeled, that killed old Mrs. Barnaby from Boston to Denver? Not only that, for it is apt to prove a double-barreled shot as Dr. Graves, who sent it, is apt to die (on the gallows) from the effects of it.

Hang a bouquet of mistletoe boughs in the door and all the rest of the year keep looking so sweet that the men folks in the family can't resist kissing you. If your husband pretends he hasn't any taste for such things encourage your big brother or growing son. To be led into temptation of this sort is the very best thing that could happen to a young man.

Some of the members of the freeholders' convention have expressed a decided objection to having their meeting held in the basement of the Seventh Street Methodist church. They give as a reason for their antipathy that the place is damp and apt to invite la grippe. Now, is it not a sudden revulsion at being brought into such novel and close contact with the house of God?

"During the absence of her better half," notes the admiring Virginia city (Nev.) Enterprise, "Mrs. Orlando E. Jones is running the Bodie Miner, assisted by three printers. Last week the types were all laid up by sickness, and Mrs. Jones got the paper out on time and all alone, with the exception of the presswork. Mr. Jones talks of raising her wages and discharging the balance of the force."

Will our friend, the San Francisco Evening Report, or some one for it, tell us why it invariably uses the adverb hither instead of here? At first we were inclined to the belief that it was but an incident with the writers of that journal, as we are sometimes inclined to use obsolete words or phrases instead of those in modern use, but the Report appears to have barred the customary adverb of place, here, from its columns, as it is never to be found there. Is it eccentricity, or is there a sensible reason?

This is the "Happy New Year" of very many young men: He said "Happy New Year," and I treated. Then we drank the greetings of the day at his expense; then we emphasized it at mine, and sealed it at his. A friend dropped in and we let him in on the merry making. It took three rounds before we were all even. Another friend came in and four toasts were clinked in the glasses before this friend's "Happy New Year" had been properly responded to. Then we were all taken home—that's all.

One of the prettiest features of Berlin is its corps of uniformed flower girls. Only pretty girls are selected for the work, and their uniform, the national costume of the Isle of Rugen, is furnished by the stock company who manage the enterprise. A home is also provided for them, and they must be in at midnight. The young swells of the high-priced restaurants and cafes pay double and treble the price of a flower to the pretty flower girl, who is allowed to appropriate the surplus over the price required by the company.

The San Francisco Star entered upon its sixteenth volume the first of the year, with every indication of continued prosperity in the field of journalism. James H. Barry, its brave and chivalrous editor, has ever been the unrelenting foe of the boodlers, bosses, and corruptionists of San Francisco, whilst the big dailies have acted the part of cowards in refraining from exposing a state of affairs which they knew to exist in the politics of that city. The Star is destined to become the most influential paper published at the metropolis.

Why has not some funny paper thought of this gruesome "joke," so called: One Sawtelle killed his brother in Concord, N. H., and as customary in cold blood. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to hang. But apoplexy suddenly intervened and the night before he was to play his final engagement on a single string he died in his cell. His attorney made an effort in all parts of the state to have him buried, yet every cemetery was closed against him, as the people refused to give him sepulture. The joke alluded to is, that the fratricide sought hell (Sawtelle) and he found it, even on earth. See!

It is quite possible to cherish fine and keen perceptions of other people's feelings, and thus to discover how we are affecting them by our conduct. The selfish sensitiveness which smarts at every slight or unkindness to itself, and perhaps imagines many more, is often replaced by callous insensibility when the feelings of others come to be considered. It is those who exact the most that usually give the least. Carlyle says: "In good breeding, which differs, if at all, from high breeding only as it gracefully remembers the rights of others rather than gracefully insists on its own rights, I discern no special connection with wealth or birth, but rather that it lies in human nature itself, and is due from all men to all men."

The News last week gives the result of an interview it had with several leading members of the republican party, the subject being who would be probably prominent candidates to succeed Congressman McKenna, should the president appoint that gentleman to the circuit bench in place of Judge Sawyer, deceased. Among the interviewed was our genial and efficient city attorney, E. C. Hart. That gentleman is reported as having expressed a preference for ex-Speaker Coombs of Napa. It can't be that Lige does not know that Napa is not in this congressional district. And then that prominent lawyer and well-informed public man, Clinton White, is made to say "this is the short term of congress." On the contrary, is it not the term that often runs into August or September?

The Bee, boasting of its circulation and influence, relates that two years ago a committee of the supervisors went out in the country to near the San Joaquin county line to see about building a bridge; a Bee reporter accompanied. While there the party met a couple of old bachelor brothers, early settlers, and very rich. The reporter "wrote them" up in style, relating how they kept their wealth buried in the cellar rather than trust the banks. A few days ago the brothers were robbed, and one of them badly beaten. Now, the Bee boasts that even the tramp thugs read that paper, as it must have been the account of their wealth given two years ago that aroused the cupidity of the itinerant burglars. Does it not occur to our friends that it takes a long time for the Bee to get a very short distance?

A Swede, Charles Schmidt by name, has allowed himself to be taken at Denver for one of the murderers of the Greenwood woman at Napa in February of last year. Schmidt was drunk on New Year's day and couldn't help giving himself away to a listening detective. Of course he was "taken in," and when he sobered he persisted in the story, and went into the detail of how an American thug met him on the road to Napa, probably from Benicia as nearly as he can recollect, and forced him to go to the Greenwood ranch, and then to help to murder and rob the old people. Schmidt's story reads smoothly till he comes to that part where he says the American gave him a gun to stand guard and prevent the approach of others, and that he, Schmidt, on a good opportunity presenting itself, put the gun to the other fellow's head and pulled trigger, but the gun refused to be discharged. Yet he says this butcher of the aged lady was blood-thirsty and threatened him with death if he did not aid in the work. Does he want people to believe the man who directed him what to do quietly allowed him to snap a gun at his head, and quietly paid no attention to the attempt on his life? Is it not more probable Schmidt's carcass would have been found lying by the side of old Mrs. Greenwood, with his Swedish head blown off?

Rest for Farmers' Wives.

At least a third of our women complain that they can't do their housework without great weariness, and many are obliged to hire help who otherwise would not if they would sit down to talk, or sit to do such work as could be as easily done sitting as standing, and then we could keep rested. No one should keep on the feet until trembling and tired, but keep within strength, and then strength would increase; but if worked to exhaustion, it sooner or later brings on weakness and disease. If sitting does not give complete rest, then lie down each day more or less. If not overworked, the mind is much clearer and the nerves steadier; the sharp answer not half so apt to be spoken.

Passive People.

Charles Newton Hood does not like passive people, and thus gives his impressions of them through the Epoch: If there is one class of people that exasperates me more than any other, it is the passive people. How I hate them! Some of them were born that way, and some of them don't know enough to act in any other way; but most of them have cultivated passivity, aided by an unappreciative nature, which is more or less assisted in its work of unappreciation by a dearth of brains. They have read somewhere, or heard somebody say, that it is the correct thing never, under any circumstances, to display emotion of any sort. They are really, you know, the kind of people who don't appreciate a thing until the next day, anyway. When a thing is particularly sad they struggle painfully for a long time to discover where the joke comes in, so that they may be sure to be fortified against any inclination to smile; and when something uproariously funny occurs, they have a puzzled look on their faces until about 10 o'clock the next forenoon, and then they see where the fun came in; but they can't enjoy a good laugh even then, poor fools.

Of course, I have more or less pity for them; but how I despise those who have read in some etiquette book or other that well-bred persons never display any emotion whatever—therefore, they never allow themselves to appear saddened by any combination of circumstances, and screw their faces up like a Chinese god rather than laugh at anything, no matter how funny. Then there is the other crowd of dough-heads who always throw a pall over any company which is trying to enjoy something funny, beautiful, artistic or delightful, because they feel that by so doing they will not sufficiently emphasize the fact that they have seen or heard better.

Darn these passive people, anyway. They are always spoiling my fun. When I see anything particularly pretty I do like to say that I think it is so, enthusiastically. When something ludicrous happens, I like to throw my head back and ha! ha! right out; and when little Eva dies and the chorus of genuine negro jubilee singers just behind the "wings" at R. U. E. sings "Old Black Joe," I'm a good deal happier because I have to wink pretty hard to keep back the tears. And then I look around, and there sits a passive person, with a sort of supercilious look upon his face, as though he were wondering why I couldn't just as well be well-bred and control my emotions.

Why, I laugh just as loud and heartily now a days when the clown in the circus climbs up on the horizontal bar and falls off as I did when I was a little boy, and I enjoy it all hugely until I look around and see two or three of those passive fools with that horribly bored what-is-the-ill-bred-person-laughing-at expression on their faces, looking at me in a surprised and disgusted manner, and all the joy is gone from me. Then, I will be up in the mountains watching the sun drop out of sight in the lake, while the clouds are brilliantly illuminated in honor of the event, everything is dazzling with color, and a broad path of gold, brilliant, sparkling, and magnificent as the entrance to the palace of an angel leads down across the bosom of the waters—a sight that makes a man wonder that there can be such a bewildering vision of beauty as always makes me desirous of hunting up a blind man somewhere, and giving him my last copper in sympathy. Then, while I am going into raptures over it all like a little maiden attending her first pantomime, I happen to look around and remark, "Isn't it beautiful?" and the passive person looks pityingly at me and says, "Oh, yes, very pretty, but you ought to see a sunset from the Rigi," and immediately the sky turns black for the rest of us, the brilliant colors become somber, the golden path is tarnished, a cold breeze seems to sweep down upon us all and we are miserable. You sail up the Hudson and rave over the Highlands, and there is always some passive, traveled fool there, who murmurs of the Rhine, and refuses to allow his soul to so far forget its breeding as to become enraptured by the beauty all about him.

But, after all, aren't those poor, silly, passive people the greatest losers when you come to think of it? They never have a good time at all. Life must be a weary, weary waste for them. They don't know the joy of getting up and whooping and swinging their hats, and believing with all their hearts that Jones should, of a right, be elected alderman from the steeple ward. They don't know what enthusiasm is. They can't laugh and howl and fall off their chairs when something humorous strikes them, and they can't cry. They mustn't be startled, and they must never be alarmed. They can't enjoy anything because they are so busy all the time dissembling, and, poor fools, poor fools, I pity them, I pity them—about half as much as I despise them.

The Burmese women are great personages and play a great part in their households. They choose their own husbands and divorce them when they like, retaining their own property and all that they have earned; they are at liberty to marry again whether as widows or divorcees.

Shop-Girl and Novel.

She got into a Woodward-ave. car, going north, at the opera-house crossing, and was no sooner seated than she tore the paper off a parcel and began to devour the contents of a novel. At the same time she took a stick of gum from her pocket and stuffed it into her mouth.

First page—Some slight exhibition of interest and vigorous efforts to get the gum rolled into a quid.

Second page—Plot begins to develop and interest increases. Movements of the jaw still regular.

Third page—Introduces the villain and the heroine. Heroine transcendently beautiful; villain an A1 chap. Jaws now settling down to regular business.

Fourth page—The villain gives away to the reader his cold-blooded plot to carry the heroine off to a dungeon in case she won't be his'n. Goes away for a few days to put said dungeon in order. Jaws now working as steadily as the pendulum of an old Connecticut clock; shop-girl also crosses her feet.

Fifth page—Heroine makes up her mind not to marry the villain, if the court knows herself. She conceals a butcher-knife in the sleeve of her dress, and tries to calm her nerves by thrumming the wild guitar. Jaws now keeping time with the revolutions of the car wheels, three revolutions to one chaw.

Sixth page—Enter the heroine's father. Loves his daughter, and all that, but has traded mules so often that he is now dead broke, and the house-rent is due. Doesn't want to sacrifice her happiness, but if she could make up her mind to wed the villain it would be sugar in his pockets. Chaw! chaw! chaw!

Seventh page—Heroine bursts into tears—real large tears—and throws herself at her father's feet. He calmly uses her for a foot-stool, and wants to know how in Texas they are going to pay the grocer and butcher and run two coal stoves on cheek. At that very moment the sheriff may be knocking at the door. Listens intently. Very exciting here, and the shop-girl's jaws skip a cog—two of them.

Eighth page—Heroine dashes the tears from her eyes and springs up to exclaim: "Father, I cannot do it! I do not love Hernando even a little bit, while I have solemnly promised to marry Alf. Smith! If you love me—if you wish to cater to my future happiness—go out and strike a job and do a little honest perspiring. I love you, father, but Hernando isn't in it!" Shop-girl crosses and uncrosses her feet in excitement, and breathes hard. Jaws a little off motion.

Ninth page—Old man retires to the woodshed to sit and think, and the heroine writes a letter to Alf. to come and get her at once if he wants her. Sends the note by the servant girl, who loses it on the street and then runs away for fear of results. While waiting for Alf. the heroine slips a revolver into her pocket and brings in the family axe. Shop-girl almost swallows her gum in her excitement.

Tenth page—Villain returns. Dungeon all prepared. Regular old home-made dungeon, with all old-fashioned ingredients. Heroine got to marry him or away she goes. Given fifteen seconds to make up her mind. She kicks, and he makes it seventeen. Time expires and demands he her answer. "No, villain—never!" she shouts. He seizes her with a "Ha!" and she seizes the butcher-knife. He then throws her over his shoulder to bear her hence, when she takes a firm hold of the knife, raises her arm, and with one blow—!

Too much for the shop-girl. She has swallowed her gum and can hardly get her breath. Decides to wait until she gets home, puts the book up and leans back to figure on how many feet of that cold, cruel steel penetrated the bold, bad Hernando's villainous heart.—Detroit Free Press.

FLASHES.

We never hear of a strike on the "wages of sin."

Time heals everything except wounded pride and rubber boots.

A woman may be fair and square, but a little round plumpness is to our taste.

The half that is not told is what the women wish to hear—the worse, the better relished.

If some "good" people would preach what they practice, a real sensation would be created.

A rocking chair in a dark room is usually a monster, and never fails to collide with a sore toe.

The greatest trouble in climbing to the top of the ladder, is the fact that life is so short and the ladder is so long.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Barbour-Beebe Company will occupy the Clunie Opera House next week.

U and I drew a full house last night. The comedy has been very much changed since last produced in this city. To-night U and I again.

That splendid spectacular play, The Devil's Auction, will be the next attraction at the Metropolitan. This is one of the plays that never grows old or tiresome.

The "Secret."

Can some one enlighten the opaque condition of our intelligence by imparting to us a just reason for the selection by our "society" leaders of such asinine titles as distinguish the annual dancing clubs that are formed in this city? One would have supposed that after all the straining and grunting of years past, that resulted in most unbecoming and inappropriate titles for those affairs, that the baptismal committee this year—for of course, the thing is always left to an intelligent and highly educated, classical committee—would have experienced by the follies of the past and selected a name ordinary mortals might understand, or at least have been able to pronounce without the aid of a Greek lexicon (that means dictionary). But no; here we are called on this winter to invite our best girl to do us the honor to permit us the outlay of at least ten dollars (carriage extra) by going to the Esoteric with us. Now, as the word means secret, and is an adjective, coming from the far-away Greek, we simply ask the girl if she will go to the "secret" with us. But there is nothing like being wise, and the use of big words in the wrong place is what made Mrs. Partington's fame, and fortune for the old dame and Ike. The writer of this note, while residing one winter in a little up-country town, was approached by the leader of the high-tone of the town, who said he and a few others had formed a dancing club for the season, and that he had been appointed a committee, all by himself, to select an appropriate name for the infant. He said he felt the weight of the responsibility, and had, after mature thought and many sleepless nights, hit upon the one above all others that had passed in review through his fertile brain, that would just meet the wishes of the members. He would call it the Olympic, and honored this writer by asking if it met his approval, and the writer certainly did agree, telling the committee-man that it was most appropriate since the vast majority of the members in their mode of dancing gave greater promise of success as acrobatic artists than they did as disciples of the dance. And yet it was just as appropriate a title for a dancing club as is this adjective Esoteric, which, when properly written, must be with a small "e" to begin it.

Chosen Friends Installation.

District Deputy Grand Councilor A. Schumaker on Thursday evening last installed the officers of Friendship Council, No. 65, O. C. F., for the ensuing term, as follows: Councilor, F. W. Carpenter; Vice Councilor, Miss Maggie Kearney; Secretary, E. R. Tiel; Treasurer, F. H. Kiefer; Prelate, Miss L. M. Dodson; Marshal, M. M. Glenn; Warden, Miss G. D. Jurgens; Guard, Mrs. A. E. Monaghan; Sentry, Ferdinand Gleie. At the close of the installation ceremonies, a short but excellent literary and musical program was rendered, after which all present partook of refreshments. The Order of Chosen Friends is recognized as one of the best fraternal and beneficiary organizations in existence, and the rapidly increasing membership of the councils in Sacramento is good evidence of its popularity.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsell, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

Col. T. W. Higginson says: "However desirable on other grounds may be the extension to women of all the education and all the opportunities of men, it is clear that this will not of itself make them all saints, since it has not done this for men."

Don't Argue.

There is no spirit in the family that is so fatal to peace and, consequently, happiness as the desire to argue on trivial pretexts. One person possessed of the mania for setting all the rest right may make a household of worthy, easy-going people miserable. There is nothing right in the household except what she herself personally superintends; for the individuals who consider themselves delegated to the task of correcting the other members of the family are usually persons who devote themselves to this employment and have little time for any other work. The hard-working man or woman has no time to devote to the shortcomings of others; it is usually the sluggish and idler who stands about and watches others work, who can suggest a dozen ways in which they could do better. The wise man of Israel has truly said: "A fool's lips enter into contention;" and the contentious fool is as common a nuisance to-day as he no doubt was in the time of Solomon. Usually, in proportion to their lack of actual knowledge do such persons presume to set themselves up as dictators to the others of their households. If the household dictator is the mother of the family or an elder sister, she steps aside from her legitimate sphere to argue and dictate to her husband or brothers in matters of business, about which she often knows nothing at all, and neglects her housework. If the husband or a brother is inclined to exercise petty tyranny over the rest of the family, he is in nine cases out of ten a "hen-bussy" who fails to furnish his quota of support to the family, and works off the energy which might be employed in a worthier cause dictating to the others how they should work. As a rule, the rest of the family where such a dictator makes his abode are too busy to do anything but stoutly submit to a nagging tongue, and they usually go stolidly on in their way. Yet, like the dropping of water on stone, which in time leaves its mark, such arguing is a source of annoyance and wears upon the nerves of the listeners, however they have schooled themselves to bear and forbear. The men or women who exercise their energies as household dictators are, altogether, disagreeable specimens of humanity, but, unhappily, are not uncommon. The dictator is often the last person in the house who realizes the discomfort that his system of nagging produces, as such a person, in the necessities of the case, is a preeminently selfish individual whose horizon is limited to himself, and who only takes in the rest of the world as they are his and form a part, in that way, of his selfish interests.—New York Tribune.

Gentleman as Well as Soldier.

I was told a good story about General Grant the other day that I never saw in print, says the Washington correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal. It will be recalled that early in the war the New York Fire Zouaves were a crack regiment commanded by Colonel Ellsworth. Every man in the ranks had been a fireman, and it was confidently believed that Ellsworth's command was able to put down the rebellion without assistance. The colonel was a young man, handsome, gallant, burning with military ardor and thirsting for military fame. He was as much the idol of the north as was Ashby, a few months later, the idol of the south. The Fire Zouaves were the first troops to march into Alexandria, Va. Their colonel was at their head, and after the town had surrendered he saw a rebel flag flying from a hotel. Instead of ordering a squad to remove it, he bolted into the house, ascended the stairway, went out on the roof, and captured the flag; descending, he was confronted by the landlord—one Jackson—who shot him dead. Jackson himself was then shot to death, and the affair created more sensation than considerable battles a year or two later.

After the war a daughter of Jackson secured an appointment in one of the departments in Washington. She was a modest, diligent and capable young woman, and discharged her official duties acceptably. In course of time a super-loyal gentleman was put in charge of the bureau in which she worked. Nosing around, he soon discovered the antecedents of the young clerk, and discharged her. She was friendless and penniless, and, as a last resort, went to the White House and called for General Grant. He received her, and she related her story to the silent man. Without saying a word, he took a sheet of paper and wrote: "The war against men is ended, and my administration shall not begin one against women. Restore Miss Jackson to her former clerkship, instantly." This was addressed to the loyal bureau official, and the lady is yet in the public service.

That was an exhibition of chivalry that Dunois or Francis I might have envied.

Little Ethel went to church with her grandmother, and for the first time put ten cents on the contribution plate. Leaning over, she whispered very audibly: "That's all right, grandma, I paid for two."

The hard rubs are what 'make a man bright. It would take considerable rubbing to brighten some.

The Nervous Age.

Men are controlled by the state of their nerves; and the excitement of modern life, together with the common use of stimulants, has had a tendency to make the nerves peculiarly sensitive and even irritable. That we are dependent on our environment, and are the creatures which our sensations and the world's impressions make us, has long been taught as a philosophical theory, and is now reduced to practice. Ideals are discarded as standards of conduct, and hard realities have taken their place. Faith has been obliterated from many a heart, leaving nothing but a materialistic realism as the basis of life. Reason, with its principles, is questioned, and the noblest inspirations are suspected as illusions. Thus the vulgar philosophy of the day dooms man to the sphere of the senses and the power of the impressions received through them.

"It is startling to what extent the masses in Europe have lost the idea of life as having a grand mission; hence, immediate earthly concerns are the dominant factors; not a high purpose that includes God as well as man, heaven as well as earth, and eternity as well as time. Constantly yielding to what is present and near, men lose their self-control not only, but themselves; gratification, pleasure, becomes the aim of life. The temples of Venus and Bacchus are the sanctuaries of millions who never enter the house of God. Men seek excitement in society, in sport, from the novel; and even art, and especially music, has been robbed of its divinity in order to minister to the demand for the sensational. Instead of the grand thoughts which are the soul of Shakespeare's plays, the theater is devoted to the spectacular, the exciting, to the interest of the moment.

"Even children are affected by the common trend. Suicides are becoming more frequent among them, and for the most trivial causes—a rebuke, punishment for a misdemeanor, or the failure to pass an examination at school. On the continent suicides occur with frightful frequency in all circles of society, from youth to old age, because men are disappointed in love or fortune, are momentarily depressed or are weary of life. The evidence thus furnished that men are controlled by their nerves instead of by character, faith, reason, a high purpose in life, is abundantly confirmed by the testimony of physicians, especially by such as have charge of insane asylums."

The picture thus painted of Europe is equally true of America; indeed, we Americans are proverbially the most nervous of people. Insanity is increasing at a fearful rate amongst us, and millions who are not insane are hysterical—the fine balance of nature is destroyed. We live too fast. Excitement is an appetite which grows by what it feeds on. The journals on the express of life are hot. 'Tis time to whistle "Down brakes!"

One remedy for this ominous state of things is to be found in physical culture. Stop the use of stimulants. Avoid excitement. Go slow. Live simply. Go back to nature. And, above all, develop the body. A prominent physiologist affirms that it is necessary, in order to do the best thinking and living, that the brain be supplied with a regular and plentiful supply of blood; that this blood be kept free from carbon dioxide and charged with oxygen; and that it be nourished with wholesome food. These ends can be secured only when the heart pumps the blood vigorously on its appointed rounds; when the lungs thoroughly purify and oxygenize it, and when the nutritive processes of the body are so stimulated that the digestive organs do their work with thoroughness.

How can these three results be attained? By sanitary living, and not otherwise. We must live more out of doors, must exercise more, must develop muscle, and must avoid unnecessary drains upon vitality. Huddled as we are in cities, in an artificial environment, with sedentary pursuits and habits, we must find or create some means whereby we can counteract these evils and secure the necessary amount of exercise. "I wish," cries a well-known physician, "that a commissioner of physical education could be appointed for the nation. Would it be possible for the various state legislatures to make physical education compulsory in all the free schools? It has vitally to do with the mental and moral life of the country. Few truths are more clearly taught by history than that the physical condition of the people determines the fate of the commonwealth."

Side by side with this bodily culture should go the culture of the soul. The age has lost its moorings; anchor it again. Principles have been shaken; reestablish them. A sensational philosophy dominates the masses; replace it with the philosophy of reason. Conscience has been robbed of its authority; put the scepter back again in its right hand. God has been dethroned in the irreverent thoughts of multitudes; reseat Him on His throne with ringing hosannas. There is plenty of occupation nowadays for both school and meeting-house.

That was a devoted lover who swallowed the postage stamp on her letter, because her lips had touched it.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

Quite Possible.

There was never a more surprised and dumfounded man in Philadelphia than a certain well-known merchant, whose wife presented him a short time ago with a little Chinese baby. "My—!" he exclaimed, when the nurse deposited the new-born infant in his arms, "where did you get this?" "It is yours," emphatically declared the nurse. The bewildered man gave one affrighted glance at his baby's queer little pigeon-eyes, high cheek bones, and bald pate with dark shadowy tuft at the crown, and nearly fainted away. He tried to persuade himself that he was the victim of some horrible nightmare, but the evidence of his senses was too convincing. He flew to his wife's bedside to find her also in a most distressed state of mind over the advent of the miniature Ah Siu. "It is all due to that wretched Sunday-school class of yours," he could not help moaning. For a long time his wife has been a zealous teacher in one of the local Sunday schools, and has been endeavoring to instill the gospel into the benighted minds of a class of Chinese. Her labors among them had so impressed their features upon her mind as to produce the disastrous result. Whether or not she will now give up her interesting class is a matter unannounced.—Philadelphia Record.

Col. Tom's Sentiment.

"Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead," says Thos. P. Ochiltree. "Fill their lives with sweetness. Speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them and while their hearts can be thrilled and made happier by them. The kind things you mean to say when they are gone say before they go. The flowers you mean to send for their coffins send to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them. If my friends have alabaster boxes laid away, full of fragrant perfumes of sympathy and affection, which they intend to break over my dead body, I would rather they would bring them out in my weary and troubled hours and open them, that I may be refreshed and cheered by them while I need them. I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower, a funeral without an eulogy, than a life without the sweetness of love and sympathy. Let us learn to anoint our friends beforehand for their burial. Post-mortem kindness does not cheer the burdened spirit. Flowers on the coffin cast no fragrance backward over the weary way."

Where Isinglass Comes From.

The best isinglass comes from Russia, where it is obtained from the giant sturgeon which inhabits the Caspian sea and the rivers which run into it. This fish often grows to the length of twenty five feet, and from its air-bladder the isinglass is prepared. It is subjected to many processes before being ready for sale, but the Russians, knowing it has the reputation of being the best, take great pains in its preparation, and in the world's markets it has practically no rival. A great deal is made along the Amazon, in Brazil, but it is very coarse and inferior and is used for the refining of liquors and similar purposes. The adulteration of good isinglass with the inferior kinds can always be detected by placing samples in boiling water. The best isinglass will dissolve completely, leaving no visible residuum, while the inferior variety will show threads of fibrous tissue and be of a dark color, often almost brown.

A Question of Ownership.

Uncle Epimenides, called Uncle Ep, in the days of his slavery brought out a nice point of meum et tuum. He had been given by his master a new hat, of which he was very proud, and which was only worn on Sunday or other state occasions. He was met by his master on one occasion returning from church through a heavy summer shower, the rain beating on his bare head, while the new hat was tucked carefully under his coat.

"Why don't you put on your hat, Ep? your head will get wet," said his master.

"Well, you see, mars," answered Ep, "the head's yours, but the hat's mine, and I'm 'blege' to take care of it."

Most young men, when they become of age, look around for some business in which they can either find wealth or fame, regardless of the natural law in such cases, believing they could succeed in a business they do not know better than a prosperous acquaintance; and such wild ideas are not unfrequently carried out and followed by disastrous results. If young men just entering a business career would study out what they are best adapted for, and what they know most about, there would be fewer failures; for it is always safe to do what we can do well; there we meet with the weakest competition. If the young man's mind is on money, he will be the slave of money; and if it is on business he will be far more likely to win both fame and fortune; but these things are not of mushroom growth; they do not come in a day, but require long years of persistent effort and patience.

Affection is the broadest basis of good in life.—George Eliot.

Silence is one of the hardest arguments to refute.—Shaw.

The tallest and the shortest people of Europe, the Norwegians and the Lapse, live side by side.

The greatest plague ever known visited Naples in 1656 and carried off 380,000 people in 28 weeks.

That Baltimore lecturer who went in to prove that the devil has red hair, did it to harmonize with the theory of death on a white horse.

Vicious people who imagine they have grievances against others and try to injure them, are a good deal like the scorpion which nearly always stings itself.

"All is fair in love and war, isn't it?" she said. "I don't know," he replied, doubtfully. "I've been in love a good many times, but I never was married."—Detroit Free Press.

"Are you pretty well acquainted with your mother tongue, my boy?" asked the school teacher of the new scholar. "Yes, sir," answered the lad, timidly; "ma jaws me a good deal, sir."

There is a very strong dislike to the bat among the peasants of south Germany. A feeling of disgust and fear takes possession of the farmer who finds bats in his chimney, not only because he believes the creatures will feed upon his pork that hangs in the smoke, but because bats are regarded as unlucky, and bring poverty and misfortune.

The Spaniards are the most expert smokers in the world. A Spaniard takes a heavy pull at his cigarette, inhales it, takes up a wine skin, or wine bottle, pours a half pint down his throat, holding the vessel a foot from his mouth and not spilling a drop, and then with a sigh of satisfaction closes his eyes and exhales the smoke from his nose and mouth in clouds. He will also inhale the smoke, converse for a few minutes in a natural manner, and then blow out the smoke.

Handed down for generations in the family is a curious and valuable relic of colonial days now in possession of Mrs. Lizzie B. Link, a niece of the late Judge Stites and a clerk in the general delivery department of the postoffice. On a sheet of brown paper three by two inches in size are the characters which pronounce it a legal tender for one-third of a dollar. One side bears the inscription, "According to the resolution passed by Congress February 17, 1776;" also a dyspeptic-looking sun dial, beneath which is the terse admonition, "Mind your own business." On the reverse is a circle of thirteen links, each representing one of the states of the young union, in the center of which is the motto, "We are one." It is an interesting and valuable relic of the good old days of our forefathers and their fractional currency, some of which would prove very inconvenient at the present day.—Louisville Commercial.

The diseases the American presidents died of are given thus: Washington's fatal illness was due to a cold caught while riding about his farm in a sleet storm. John Adams' complaint was old age; that of Jefferson chronic diarrhoea, due to excessive drinking of the waters of White Sulphur springs, Va.; Madison and Monroe, old age; John Quincy Adams, paralysis; Andrew Jackson, consumption and dropsy; Van Buren, asthma and catarrh; William Henry Harrison, pleurisy, the result of a cold caught at his inauguration; Tyler, unknown; Polk, cholera; Taylor, cholera morbus, caused by drinking of ice water, followed by immoderate eating of cherries; Fillmore, paralysis; Pierce, dropsy, and Buchanan, rheumatic gout. The remaining diseases are fresh in mind, Andrew Johnson's having been due to paralysis. It is noticeable that colds and bronchial affections played a large part, effectually refuting the fallacy that "only a cold" is a matter of trifling concern.

Said a Nevada man a few evenings since: "Hank Monk was greatly overrated as a stage driver. I have known scores of better ones. But his getting Horace Greeley over the Sierras and down into Placerville 'on time' gave him great notoriety. It was a dreadful drive, and that it didn't kill the old editor was no fault of Monk's. The road was slough and rough, and Hank was full of tarantula juice when he left Carson. It was about twenty-six years ago, and Hank was thirty-eight years old. He died a few years ago, something over fifty. In the goodness of Greeley's heart he presented Hank with a gold watch, which he many times pawned, sold, and managed to get back. But there were so many ridiculous exaggerations and right up-and-down falsehoods told of that ride that Greeley became very 'tired,' and, in reply to a request of Hank some eighteen years ago for some favor, Horace wrote: 'I would rather see you 10,000 fathoms in hell than ever give you a crust of bread, for you are the only man who had the opportunity to place me in a ridiculous light, and you villainously exercised that opportunity, you d—d scamp!'"—Chicago Tribune.

W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

An Oakland divine last Sunday preached on the evil influences of Saturday night in California. So far as his statement is concerned that that particular night is characterized by unusual debauchery, disorder, and crime, no one will dispute, and will agree that drinking places should be placed under rigid surveillance. The reverend gentleman is reported by the press as believing that Saturday night had more to do with small audiences in the churches on the Sabbath day than any other cause. The custom of keeping the business houses open on that night until 10 and 11 o'clock had a demoralizing effect on both customer and merchant, as well as on the clerks. The last mentioned were required to do a day and a half's work in the day, and consequently they went home tired out and jaded. Many a young girl clerking in a store is so tired out that, no matter how much she may desire, she could not get rest sufficient to attend the Sunday-school, or morning service at church. Not only were the clerks jaded and tired, but the merchant as well, because after the close of business he would have to look over the receipts and the accounts of what had been done during the long day and evening. There was no necessity for this. He believed in the half-holiday system; and if it were adopted in California it would be a great benefit to all. He believed that if the stores closed other days at 6 o'clock in the evening, they should also do so on Saturday. More money is spent in three hours on Saturday night than in any three hours during the entire week. If the Saturday night was spent this way and in balls and parties, as was frequently the case, it was no wonder that God got very little of service on the Sabbath.

There is here a forgetting that the business of the world is governed by the law of necessity, and the fact there is more barter Saturday night than any other is because it is the desire of patrons, and to their wish the merchants must accord. At the blowing of the whistle on that evening the tired workingman ceases his week's labor, goes to his home, feeling he will have a rest Saturday night and Sunday. The professional man is largely in the same category. It would seem our clerical friend thinks people generally should forego their Saturday night shopping, stay at home, and rest up for the day of rest; that on Sunday they should attend church, willing or not willing. It must be recollected that religion itself, and particularly the observance of the Sabbath, has changed much in the last few centuries—very manifest has been the change since the beginning of the present century. England has not yet fully gotten out of the old rut of compelling people to worship in such form and at such time as the clergy dictate.

An eminent English theologian, in a work published in 1785, declared that duty on the Sabbath day is violated: First, by all such employments or engagements as (though differing from our ordinary acceptation) hinder our attendance upon public worship, or take up so much of our time as not to leave a sufficient part of the day at leisure for religious reflection; as the going of journeys, the paying or receiving of visits which engage the whole day, or employing the time at home in writing letters, settling accounts, or in applying ourselves to studies, or the reading of books which bear no relation to the business of religion. Secondly, by unnecessary encroachments on the rest and liberty which Sunday ought to bring to the inferior orders of the community; as by keeping servants on that day confined and busied in preparations for the superfluous elegancies of our table or dress. Thirdly, by such recreations as are customarily forborne out of respect to the day; as hunting, shooting, fishing, public diversions, frequenting taverns, playing at cards or dice. We doubt not the Oakland divine heartily endorses the views of the writer of 100 years ago, and it seems he outdoes him, that he desires to make Sunday commence on Saturday night. It would appear from a comparison with former years that church attendance is falling off, when the increase of population is considered. We do not ascribe this to a growth of wickedness of the people, but to the advancement of liberality in their views. The majority of the people do violate the duty to the day, if the code of the English writer is to be considered orthodoxy. Particularly is this so in cities.

Thousands there are whose tastes incline them to rest without the walls of the church; and it would hardly be charged that this great mass are wrong and the more straight-laced are right. In fact, both are right. It would be straining conscience to condemn a man who had spent six days in close confinement in the shop, the store, the office, or in fact any place of labor, if he consulted his own inclination as to the harmless disposition of the twenty-four hours which, only, during the whole week he could uninterruptedly call his own. He may be inclined to write letters to his friends, to cast up his accounts, to apply himself to the study of that which in his judgment will advance him in the world; to the reading of secular literature, to hunting or fishing, or to witnessing a game of baseball or some other innocent public diversion. Perhaps it may be his tastes incline him to array himself in his finest attire, visit and converse with his friends, or enjoy the air and sunshine in a stroll and the viewing of objects of interest. Would it be esteemed out of place if his wife or servant prepared the "Sunday dinner," or that at the setting of the sun he took his wife and little ones to an open-air concert and patronized a candy store?

Let it not be understood that we decry churches or do not appreciate to the fullest extent their moralizing influence. Sunday-schools are, above all others, agents for good, and the fact that they are largely attended is due in large degree to their attractiveness. The impressions the child receives in the Sunday-school remain with him through life. This cannot be said of church services, as a rule, for, with few exceptions, little original thought comes from the pulpit. The successful minister of to-day is the one of broad views who can look on the world as it is and divine the motives that impel the actions of individuals. The minister who feels that he has been specially ordained to reform the people of an entire city or state, to make them think as he does, to turn the current of business from its normal channel, will be a failure, and the chances are few new faces will appear in his congregation.

The Chilean story does not agree with the sworn statements of the "Baltimore" soldiers. It is likely that the government of the United States will give more credence to the uniform testimony of our blue jackets than to the secret inquisition of prejudicial and unfriendly officials of Chile. The procedure in criminal cases may be secret under the laws of Chile, but it is not mandatory that such investigations be with doors closed to all parties. In cases like the assaults on the American sailors, if Chile wished to be fair and honest, some representative of this government could have been allowed to be present. This would have shown fairness.

Julien Gordon, in discussing the works of Herbert Spencer, indulges in some happy thoughts on that gifted author's ideas of woman and her relation to government. He asks us if the political rights of women are the same as those of men—realizing that the assumption is now widely made—and if their only duty of citizenship is to consist in the casting of a vote. How shall one portion of a community, he argues, assume the rights of government without incurring any of its risks? Men have to man war vessels, to shoulder the musket in times when the public peace is threatened. Are women not only ready to do so—are they able? He concludes with the statement that, if they are not, it is useless to prate of their political rights, unless, indeed, we lived in a state of permanent peace. Here, then, in a nut-shell, lies the gist of the whole matter—the opinion of the greatest of living philosophers. Women are unqualified for governing because they are unqualified for fighting. It may here be said that it seems, indeed, a pity that women should be so unqualified. Women are by nature quicker to resent injury than men, more fiery, more easily roused to indignation at the sight of wrong, more combative. The last word is proverbially the feminine one. Then, they are more dramatic than men, and therefore more prone to be thrilled and stirred by the heroic. They are courageous, and they are cheerful under physical pain. No one will deny that in their narrow sphere—and why not, then, in a wider one?—they are diplomats, strategists, and tacticians; eminently, therefore, fitted for the subtleties of the art of war. One cannot doubt that morally they would make excellent soldiers. As to endurance! only watch the evolutions of the maiden à la mode, at one of our great watering-places; the veriest unbeliever would be persuaded, nay, converted. She will be up with the lark, swim all the morning, attend a "girl's luncheon" at noon, be in the saddle all the afternoon, dine at eight, and dance till three, and this for a period of six months of summer heat; and she will not look much the worse for the regime!

A case was tried in the court of Justice Henry this week, the title of which is "The People vs. William Curtis et als."—an innocent entitlement truly. The charge was of the filling a certain canal that had been excavated by the supervisors of this county from Sixth and Y streets in this city to Snodgrass slough. As we say, the title of the case is innocent, yet there is deep significance in the meaning of the action. The canal was designed for a double purpose: to carry from Sacramento city the surplus water and the sewage matter, and to drain the basin lying to the south of the city. Perhaps, had the canal been properly constructed in the first place, it would have answered the purpose for which it was designed, but from the evidence in this case it would appear the canal was of uneven levels, and that the water could not pass through its entire length. Of late years portions of the canal have been filled up from the tramping of stock and general neglect, and the result has been that lands to the extent of some 2,800 acres have been submerged and rendered worthless. Aside from that it is claimed, and reasonable is the claim, that the noxious odors rising from the filth in the water discharged from the city caused sickness and death. Colonel McNasser, who owns considerable land in the district affected, purchased an acre of land at the immediate point of discharge from the city, and had the ditch filled; for that act his employes were prosecuted.

We have said the case is of deep significance. It is in this: the city cannot hope to relieve itself of its sewage matter by turning it upon the lands of those without. In principle it is, as lawyers put it, "on all fours" with the hydraulic mining contention: use your property as you choose, so long as you do not injure others. A city has no more right than an individual to destroy the property and impair the health of those adjacent to it. There is another consideration: to discharge this matter upon lands south of the city, to have it there dammed up and decomposed, is injurious to the health of our own people—the prevailing winds are from that direction. The claim is made by the city authorities that of late the foul matter is pumped into the river, and that nothing but the surface water finds its way into the canal. Let that be so. We are complaining that the waters of the rivers are befouled above the suction pipe through which we draw our water supply. With what grace can we cast our filth into the Sacramento river and send it to our neighbors below? There is but one practical solution of this matter, and the sooner it is arrived at the better: put in place a modern sewerage system. In cities in the east the sewage is disposed of upon scientific principles; indeed, there are instances where profit is made from its conversion into fertilizing material. The present death rate of the city, and the numerous cases of sickness, should admonish us of the importance of immediate action. True it has been public meetings have been held on the subject, much talk and writing has been indulged in, but absolutely nothing has been accomplished. It is said we can do naught until the bonded indebtedness is paid. To the devil with the bonded indebtedness, when a question of public health is concerned. In the first place, the speculative bondholders will not starve if they will be made to wait until the bonds are due; in the second place, it is about time they were made to understand they are a little too previous. They went to the trouble of procuring from the late supreme court a decision giving them 55 per cent. of the gross, instead of 55 per cent. of the net, revenues of the water-works, and have so crippled the goose that lays the golden egg that the institution is not self-sustaining. What is the matter with cutting down the water rates to a nominal figure and giving our poorer fellow-citizens a chance to escape an oppressive burden? Three dollars a family per quarter is a considerable item; 55 per cent. of it passes to the bondholders direct. Water rates are controlled by ordinance; so are business and other licenses. Cut them down; then levy special taxes for that which we need: appropriate public buildings and a modern sewerage system. Let us instance, Would a man not be classed a fool who, owing a note due some years hence, worried about it, and, in anticipation of its coming to maturity, permitted his house to fall into decay, and jeopardized the health and lives of his family by not perfecting his kitchen and closet drainage? We do hope, that the March election is approaching, the subject of a system of sewerage will be agitated. It may hurt the doctors, may be death to the undertakers; we are not aware the people will complain.

There used to be a saying current in Lincoln's Inn years ago of a judge who recognized three degrees in liars: the liar simple, the d—d liar and the expert witness. The point lies in the fact that expert witnesses are allowed to give evidence as to what is their opinion, and hence are out of the reach of an indictment for perjury, which always hangs over the head of the ordinary witness, who can testify to fact only. There is another version which is of interest, namely, the three degrees of liars, which are said to be the liar, the d—d liar and the mining engineer.

New Yorkers want the church bells suppressed. They hate to be disturbed while they are reading the Sunday papers.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government Was Formed from Chaos.

PART XXII.

The city council again met January 14, 1850. The city was at that time inundated, and the meeting was called by the president to request the council to take further steps for the relief of those in distress.

On motion of councilman Miles, the action of that body at its last meeting in appointing captains of relief was approved, and the appointees continued in their positions until the overflow should subside.

A communication was received from Drs. Morse and Stillman in relation to taking city patients into their hospital. On motion of councilman E. J. C. Kewen, it was resolved that for all patients sent to the hospital of Morse & Stillman the city pay nine dollars per day for each, up to twenty in number; for any number over twenty, the amount proposed in their communication. [This communication is lost, and the latter rate cannot now be given.]

At this meeting of the council a communication was received from Demas Strong (afterwards first president of the city council under the charter passed in February, 1850). It was addressed "To the gentlemen of the relief committee," and continued: "Allow me to congratulate you upon the success which has attended your indefatigable exertions to alleviate the sufferings and wants of those who, by the disastrous floods which now inundate our city, have been thrown upon your hands to be provided for. Personal examination yesterday and to-day satisfies me that nothing but the most strenuous and well-directed endeavors on your part could have accomplished so much good as was ascribed to your agency, and earned so many praises as were justly bestowed upon you. In addition to the tender already made of the full use of my rooms for the accommodation of families, allow me also to say that such articles of clothing, blankets, shoes, stockings, etc., as may in your opinion be needed, I shall be most happy to place at your disposal." On motion of Dr. Miles, the communication was received and ordered to be entered on the minutes, and that the thanks of the council, under the seal of the city, be tendered to Mr. Strong for his kind and charitable offer. [To what extent the relief committee availed itself of the offer of Mr. Strong we may, perhaps, be able to set forth in a future number of this series, when we receive the private notes of Mr. Strong, kept by him during his early stay in our city.]

Councilman Snyder presented to the council several bills for taking care of the sick, which were, on motion, referred to the health officer.

Dr. George I. Pheeland, through the city council, tendered his professional services to the destitute sick through the period of inundation; and, on motion of Mr. Kewen, he received the thanks of the council for his kind offer.

The president of the council called its members to meet at the store of Smith, Bensly & Co. on the 24th of January, 1850; but, as no quorum was present at that date, it adjourned without doing any business.

The council again met on call of its president on February 2, 1850, at the Gordon House.

The account of Dr. Morrill was taken up for consideration, and it was allowed for $800. The account of Col. A. M. Winn, for $12,158 10, was presented to the council for allowance. It was referred to a committee consisting of Dr. Miles and Messrs. Kewen and Warbass, who, after examination, reported the account correct, and it was allowed, after deducting a credit to the amount of $1,825 30, and the balance ordered paid. The items of that account, which would be interesting, are not given. No public works were then being prosecuted, and nothing remains to show the services for which that large sum was paid by the council to its president. The sum of $800 was allowed to N. C. Cunningham for two months' services as marshal of the city, and $600 to C. H. Miller for services as assistant marshal. Murray Morrison (brother of the late chief justice of our supreme court) was allowed $425 for services as city attorney. Also, the sum of $300 to C. C. Sackett. The report of the secretary containing a statement of the amount of allowed accounts was received and ordered on file.

At this session of the council the following resolutions, offered by councilman Kewen, were unanimously adopted:

1. That the city council of Sacramento city return their most grateful acknowledgments to his excellency Peter H. Burnett, and Albert Priest for their liberal donation of one thousand dollars each for the care of the sick and destitute poor of this community.

2. That this and the foregoing resolution be published, and that the secretary also communicate in writing to Gov. Burnett and Albert Priest the grateful sense of the city council for the liberal aid they have tendered in alleviating the distress of the community. The council then adjourned to meet again on Feb. 5th, 1850.

Pursuant to that adjournment, the council met at the Gordon House. Present, councilmen Mills, Rogers, Warbass, Snyder and Smith.

In No. XXI of this series we referred to the fact that a public meeting was held on the 25th of January to consider the subject of constructing a levee around the city, which meeting was adjourned to Feb. 4th, and that the proceedings of that meeting were reported to the council on the 5th of February. This report was read to the council and ordered to be spread on the books of the Secretary as follows:

Proceedings of meeting of citizens; Monday, Feb. 4, 1850. At a meeting of citizens of Sacramento city, held this day at Priest, Lee & Co.'s store, to take into consideration the protection of this city from subsequent overflow, Mr. Lee took the chair and C. W. Coote was elected secretary. Mr. Woodworth made the following statement relative to the protection of the city from overflow (marked A). On motion of Mr. Bigelow it was resolved that a regular and correct survey, levels, etc., be made for the construction of the necessary works to secure the city from further overflow. On motion of Major Snyder a committee was appointed to wait upon the city council relative to this subject. Messrs. Bigelow, Gelston and Giles were appointed as said committee. On motion of Capt. Gelston, it was resolved that when this meeting adjourn it adjourn to meet again to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock to receive the report of said committee.

Exhibit A—Memoranda, with estimates of a survey made with a view to ascertain the practicability of protecting Sacramento city from inundation in high water. Commencing with soundings at the center of Sutter slough and running thence up the bank of the American fork. Embankment in slough, 100 cubic yards; from slough to Union street, 712 feet; average soundings, 2 feet; levee 2.5 feet high, with a base of 50 feet, will amount to 1,620 cubic yards. Thence to a point above head of Sutter lake, near Sixth street, 3,240 feet; average soundings, 5.6 feet; levee 2 feet high, with base as above, amounts to 6,000 cubic yards. Thence to a high ridge opposite head of lake, about 1,200 feet dyke; average soundings less than 3 feet, with a bank 3 feet high and 5 feet on top, will amount to 1,266 cubic yards. Thence high and dry ground continues round to a low swail, or slough, extending from near Sutter's fort to the American fork. Across the swail at narrowest point is about 165 feet, with an average of about 4.5 feet soundings; dyke with a bank 5 feet high and 5 feet on top will amount to 382 cubic yards. Thence high ground continues, with many deep sinuosities, around to a point opposite the burying ground ridge. Here we find a broad swail extending back to the tule swamps. The shortest distance across the burying-ground ridge is about 5,000 feet, with average soundings of a little less than 8 feet; dyke 8 feet high, 5 feet wide on top, will make 25,185 cubic yards. Thence from burying-ground point to river, 3,200 feet; average soundings, 5.8 feet; dykes with a bank 6 feet high, 5 feet on top, will amount to 10,666 cubic yards. Thence on river bank to Sutter slough, 2,440 feet; average soundings, 2 feet; levee 2.5 feet high, 50 feet base, amount to 5,555 cubic yards. Embankment in slough, 100 cubic yards. Total, 50,874 cubic yards. From the above examinations, and estimates resulting, it will be seen that Sacramento can easily be protected from inundations, and that, too, at comparatively small expense. Should, however, the city authorities, or gentlemen proprietors of real estate, deem it expedient to go into the work of leveeing and embanking to protect property from inundations, I should recommend by all means the adoption of plans of work larger in extent and more liberal in dimensions than those upon which the foregoing estimates were made. Indeed, I am of the opinion that when proper surveys and examinations are made for suitable and sufficient works to protect the city from inundations, and to secure and benefit all interests concerned, locations and plans must be adopted that will nearly or quite double the amount of work above estimated. But even at that, the great object to be accomplished, and great interests to be secured, seem to sink the expense to insignificance. Further remarks or a more detailed exposition of my views in relation to the subject, in connection with the above hasty and necessarily imperfect surveys, must be deemed unnecessary at the present time. II. P. WOODWORTH, Engineer.

The action of the city council on matters submitted to it by that committee of citizens will be given in our next number.

We give this report in detail, showing as it does in an authentic form the early struggles of the city for protection against high water at this point. The problem is not yet solved. Our present levee was constructed under an act passed in 1862; and since the decision of our supreme court holding that each landholder must protect himself against all water that may be turned on his land by others who wish to protect their own land from overflow, it looks as though the struggle must be perpetual, and that from time to time, as other levees are raised and strengthened, our city must meet the emergency by raising and strengthening its walls of defense.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The peanut gallery is the place where the bad actors get roasted.

This is the year when only servant girls will wear big hats at the theater.

Five times out of six notoriety will draw a full house and swell the box receipts, while true merit performs to empty benches.

Friend of Playwright—Tell me, now, what do you consider your greatest work? Playwright—Getting my plays accepted after they are written.

I like to quote the fragrant lines of Keats,
And often I am caught by Shelley's tone;
And yet, for clever turns and quaint conceits,
Give me some tender lyrics of my own.

Cora—The amateurs decided at the last moment not to put on Hamlet. Dora—Such a sweet play, too; what was the trouble? Cora—They found out that it had been done before.

Henry Irving recently attended the rehearsal of a play to be given by boys in the Manchester grammar school, and admirably assisted the amateur actors with many little suggestions.

Joseph Jefferson's son Charles, instead of going on the stage, has preferred to act as business manager for dramatic companies. He is conducting two or three ventures of this sort besides looking after his father's affairs. He is said to be the image of his gifted parent, except for their dissimilar ages, and to be exceedingly witty in conversation.

Mr. Richard Mansfield is learning the trials of authorship. The critics are rather rough in handling his published version of Don Juan, and the New York critic describes the work as "the crude production of a clever but unbalanced youth who had but one aim—to make himself the conspicuous figure of a romantic drama—and missed it."

There is one story of Jenny Lind which I always recall with entire confidence in its truth, because it ought to be true. After her return from her American triumph she was in Italy and went one day from Florence to the convent of Vallombrosa, to which the young Milton went when on his travels. When she came to the chapel the monks, with courteous and deprecating regret, told her that no woman could enter. She smiled as she said: "Perhaps, if you knew who I am, you would let me in." "And who might the gracious lady be?" asked the monks. But when she said, "I am Jenny Lind," every head bowed and the doors were flung wide open. Then when she seated herself at the organ and sung, where Milton had sat and played, I can imagine the heavenly visions that floated before the minds of the monks, and that they crossed themselves reverently as they listened, and believed that St. Cecilia had descended.—George William Curtis.

The Chicago Mail has the following story of Sol Smith Russell: "I've had some queer experiences during the last quarter of a century," remarked Sol Smith Russell the other night between acts at the Grand, "but the one which produced the most powerful impression on me, I think, occurred last year at Mobile. I was dining at the leading hotel in that town, and, calling one of the darkey waiters to me, said: 'Will you please bring me a glass of water?' 'Yis, sah; yis, sah,' responded the waiter. But he never moved a peg. After waiting a minute I again attracted the fellow's attention, and quietly remarked: 'Perhaps you did not understand me. I would like a glass of water.' 'Oh, yis, sah; sartingly, sah; bring it in jist a jiffy, sah.' Wondering at the necessity for so much deliberation, I at last lost patience and said, rather sharply: 'See here! I want a glass of water, and I want it now. I'm in a hurry.' The darkey seemed to be genuinely alarmed, for he started toward the kitchen at a brisk gait, walked half way across the dining-room, halted, wheeled about and rather timidly returned to my table, where he made a most obsequious gesture and added, apologetically, 'Presently, sah.' This was a little too much, for my thirst had grown in geometrical proportion to the waiter's dilatoriness. 'Confound you,' I exclaimed, 'do you intend to bring me that glass of water or not? I've been trifled with long enough now, and I am getting weary.' 'Pahdon, sah,' replied the terrified darkey. 'In jist one minute, sah. Done bring it to yuh jist as soon's ever I kin. De odder gem'len, ober dar, is using de glass now, but he'll be t'rough wid it in a minute.'"

What is a boy? He is a fun-loving human animal. His reason is as yet only instinct. His conscience is in posse rather than in esse. He is so much raw capacity. Whether he shall become a devil or an angel depends upon two things, viz.: environment and tuition. Watch ye, therefore.

Edgar Saltus, the novelist, is pictured as a small man with a sturdy frame, a fine head, an observant eye and a mustache black as night.

Some French author's have adopted the practice of using green tinted paper for manuscript, finding it less harmful to the eyes than white paper.

Andrew Lang says we use too little ceremony nowadays in speaking of living great men. Our forefathers said "Mr. Addison" and "Mr. Pope." Quite so. We say "Addison" and "Pope," and posterity may possibly say "Lang."

Hattie Tyng Griswold has written a new novel, soon to be issued under the name of "At Klosterheim." The story deals with the problem of vice and poverty in great cities, and introduces localities and people never before treated in fiction.

Alexander Kielland, the poet-novelist of Norway, is a candidate for mayor of his native town, Stavanger. As Kielland has ridiculed the society institutions and intellectual culture of Stavanger in his stories, his political ambition has caused considerable surprise. At first it was believed that the novelist was not in earnest.

A young Milwaukee girl who met Paul B. Du Chaillu recently, says that the explorer is a "funny-looking little man," who sat and stared at her for an hour before he was introduced, and then overwhelmed her with flattery. The genial traveler's reputation as a "lady's man" seems from this anecdote to be not wholly undeserved.

Nathaniel Hawthorne made a curious wager with Jonathan Cilley when both were at college in 1824. The memorandum in writing dated Bowdoin college, November 14, binds Cilley to pay Hawthorne a barrel of the best old Madeira wine if Hawthorne marries before November 14, 1836. Hawthorne, who was a bashful youth, pledging himself in turn to pay Cilley the wine in case Hawthorne should still be a bachelor. Cilley lost, but was killed by Graves in a duel before he could pay the debt.

A letter of Charles Dickens, printed in the Hans Christian Andersen correspondence, invites the Dane to visit England and stay at Tavistock house or Gads-hill, whichever he prefers: "When Aladdin shall come out of those caves of science to run a triumphant course on earth, and make us all wiser and better—as I know you will—you ought to come for another visit. You ought to come to me, for example, and stay in my house." Andersen accepted this invitation, and to the close of his life was never weary of telling how he and 'Charle-ss Deeckeens' played at 'creeckeet.'"

At some time in their lives the great majority of people feel their need of poetry just as they do of preaching. They are perhaps as willing to pay their poets as they are their preachers. Some few they do pay well, but the rest must ride Pegasus around the circuit with barely enough in the way of solid returns to pay for his oats. And every poet, no matter how fine a writer he is, must begin and be content to remain a circuit rider all his life—content to be solaced with the thought that perhaps, in the long processes of time, his work may get reputation enough to enable the publishers to make money out of it after his death.

Mark Twain's wife was a Miss Langdon, of Elmira. When "Mark" first met her, says the Hartford Courant, he was not so distinguished as now. Her father was a judge, and doubtless expected "family" and social importance in his son-in-law. Clemens, however, became interested in his daughter and after awhile proposed, but was rejected. "Well," he said to the lady, "I didn't much believe you'd have me, but thought I'd try." After awhile he "tried" again, with the same result, and then remarked, with his celebrated drawl: "I think a great deal more of you than if you'd said 'yes,' but it's hard to bear." A third time he met with better fortune, and then came the most difficult part of the task—to address the old gentleman. "Judge," he said to the dignified millionaire, "have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?" "What? what?" exclaimed the judge, rather sharply, apparently not understanding the situation, yet doubtless getting a glimpse of it from the inquiry. "Have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?" "No, indeed," replied the magnate, sternly; "no, sir, I have not." "Well, look sharp and you will," said the author of "Innocents Abroad," and that is the way he asked the judicial luminary for his daughter's hand.

Client—What makes you so certain that you will be able to break the will? Lawyer (in a whisper)—I drew it.

When Mr. Blaine was in congress he used frequently to repeat bills under discussion after having read them once.

Daniel Webster was able to repeat the whole constitution of the United States, word for word, including punctuation stops.

Senator Sherman, Senator Hoar and ex-Senator Evarts are all cousins, and they trace their lineage back to Roger Sherman, the grim puritan of revolutionary times.

Lipsius, a professor at the University of Leyden, offered to recite Tacitus' history in its entirety in the presence of a person armed with a poniard, who should stab him with it at the first error.

The old school of oratory represented by Marshall, Clay, Webster and Everett has almost passed away, and only George William Curtis and a few others remain to show us what American oratory was in its prime. The popular speaker of to-day is he who can put tersely his thoughts in the language of the multitude.

The late Senator Plumb was a plain, blunt man—blunt even to the point of rudeness. When Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Russell Harrison asked him to exert his influence in behalf of an appropriation for the woman's department of the world's fair he is reported to have said: "You ladies come here and use your positions and influence to affect senators, but the poor woman who is starving for the want of a pension has the doors of senators shut in her face." It seemed a rude speech, but the senator's friends say he would have acted with equal firmness toward a queen.

This story about General Butler, picked up by the Boston News, if not true, is good enough to be so: It is said that the veteran lawyer formerly owned a large mastiff, who became famous for continued depredations on various butcher carts as they passed through the streets of Lowell on their morning rounds. The dog was so ferocious that none dared attack it, so for a time he was quite master of the situation. Finally one victim decided to approach the general on the subject; so one morning, accosting him on the street, he said: "General Butler, if a man's dog stole meat from your butcher cart what would you do?" "Why," said the lawyer, "I should make him pay for it." "Very well," continued the butcher, "your dog has stolen $2 50 worth of meat from my cart, and I want you to pay for it." "Certainly," said General Butler, "but I shall have to charge you $5 for professional advice." It is said the case was not pressed.

A rather crude citizen of Seguin, a small town in western Texas, was elected justice of the peace, and the only law book he had was Cushing's Manual. The first case before him was that of a cowboy for stealing a steer. When the case was called, the leading lawyer of the town, Hon. John Ireland by name, was there to defend the prisoner. "As there is no counsel for the other side," he said, "I make a motion that the case be dismissed." The justice looked over his manual. "A motion has to be seconded," he said. "I second the motion," promptly responded the prisoner. "The motion has been seconded that the case be dismissed," said the court; "all in favor will please say 'aye.'" The prisoner and his attorney voted "aye." "All opposed will say 'no.'" Nobody voted. "The motion is carried, and the case is dismissed," repeated the court. "A motion to adjourn is now in order." The prisoner made the motion, and the court adjourned to a saloon in the vicinity.

Bishop Hare, of South Dakota, is fond of telling stories about himself to illustrate the point which he playfully makes, that a man who lives long on the plains comes to be a good deal of a barbarian. Once, so one of his stories runs, he had the misfortune, while entering a dining-room in this city, to step upon the skirt of a lady's dress. Apologizing, he said: "You know that I have been living with the Indians lately and have grown somewhat awkward." The lady, Miss Potter, quickly replied: "I don't think that, bishop; but I am surprised at one thing—that, after living so long with the Indians, you shouldn't be better at following up a trail." A few evenings later another little affair occurred, the story of which the bishop tells as follows: "I was talking with a charming woman, when up came a gentleman who claimed her attention for a moment in another part of the house. As she went away she gave me her ice and asked me to keep it for her. She had hardly gone before a brother clergyman engaged me in a talk on the Indian question. Now, if there is any subject in which I am more interested than I am in the Indian question I can't think of it just now. At any rate, I became absorbed in my talk with my friend. Suddenly I was aroused by an inquiry addressed to me in a woman's voice. 'Where is my ice, bishop?' was the question. Upon my word, I had eaten every bit of it."

NOTES.

Colonel Ingersoll has discovered that "nothing can really kill a lie." If anything could, the lecture business might suffer.

It is often said of a man in his misfortune that he has "lost his grip;" of late he is most unfortunate when he holds his gripe.

We notice the marriage of a Mr. Solomon to a Miss Owen, both of San Francisco. That wise man has got himself into a hot place.

It is said that Emperor William is growing more unpopular in Bavaria. This would seem to imply that that province is becoming Frenchy.

It was the custom in France in the seventeenth century to kiss a lady when saluting her, and continued the common usage in England for 100 years later.

Dr. Heller, of Vienna, has made a discovery worthy of his name. It is that sauerkraut will cure dyspepsia. In the raw and gamy state it would vanquish almost anything.

Lemons are used for soap in many countries where they grow. When the men and women of the East Indies want to wash their hands they squeeze the juice of a lemon over them briskly in water until they are clean.

Secretary Rusk's daughter is said to be a model housekeeper. She arranges the menu every morning and does the marketing herself. Miss Blaine, also, "not only looks after the house, but sees to the purchasing of supplies, often visiting the stores herself."

The Farmers' Alliance is thinking of starting a paper in San Francisco, and to that end the gentlemen managing the matter are looking around for a "plant." Have a care, gentlemen, the "plant" you are looking for is a little more costly than cabbage plants, etc.

An exchange says that thirty years ago at this time, the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys were full of water. At the same period many of the inhabitants of those valleys were full of whisky, and many lost their lives because the two commodities would not mix.

Medical science is becoming distressingly unorthodox. Here is a Massachusetts doctor, and a village doctor at that, who has had the heretical audacity to set a broken neck and to have his patient in excellent health at the end of three months. A doctor with so little reverence for tradition should be tried by somebody, somewhere, and in a hurry.

The Record-Union, in expressing its just indignation at the outrage of the people of the Glenn ranch having killed twenty horses afflicted with the glanders and then throwing the carcasses in the Sacramento river, exclaims: "This is too much!" Yes, we agree with our offended neighbor; twenty dead horses for one river is too much. One would have been sufficient.

The governor suggests that the state should erect a government building in San Francisco, in order that the many public institutions having headquarters down there may be centered in one general place. This is all right and should be done; but does his excellency realize how long it takes to finish a public building in California? The new city hall is but one example. It was a new city hall twenty years ago.

There are two kinds of recipes for the cure of the grip. One kind tells what to take, and the other prescribes what not to take. As both kinds of recipes seem to hit upon about the same articles in the materia medica, it is a nice point, when you have purchased your medicine, as to whether you are to cure yourself by taking it or by not taking it. Either way may be excellent, but it is manifestly difficult to adopt both.

The telegraph lines find profit in sending messages out here to the effect that the Spanish skirt dancer, Carmencita, while dancing at Worcester, Mass., one night last week, met with the misfortune of having her skirt fall off. The dispatch does not inform the throbbing reader what was left on the voluptuous Castilian after she lost her petticoat, or what kind of a dance it became when the article from which it takes its name was discarded.

Uncle Sam loses money on some of his goods. The last session of congress appropriated $150,000 for the recoinage of worn subsidiary coin in the treasury. Of this amount $25,000 still remains, which will be used after the 15th inst. in the coinage of the new designs. The sum will be divided between the mints at San Francisco, Philadelphia and New Orleans. The appropriation was not made for the mechanical expense of coinage, but to cover the shrinkage in value due to abrasion of old coins. It is estimated that the sum will cover the loss in about $700,000 of silver pieces.

On the 18th of December last the passenger steamer "Abyssinia," on her way from New York to Liverpool, caught fire in mid-ocean. For a time it seemed that not one would survive the flames to relate how the vessel perished. But soon the German Lloyd's steamer "Spree" hove in sight. It is barely possible that it was the first occasion known when women and children, as well as men, offered up prayers in being able to get on a spree.

Rev. Mr. Silcox, in his last Sunday evening's lecture (subject, "The Eminent Dead of Last Year"), in speaking of the great services of the Rev. Dr. Crosby, told of how the latter once closed up all the saloons of New York for nine days; "and," said Rev. Silcox, "if we had half a dozen men like Mr. Crosby we could close up every dive in this little hamlet" (Sacramento). The reverend divine should not forget, in belittling the town, that there are many good people who find it convenient to reside here that they may make a living—himself among the many.

The late George Jones, of the New York Times, never claimed to be a saint. But he was an honest man—that is, according to the poet Pope, the noblest work of God. When once offered a bribe of $5,000,000 if he would refrain from the publication of certain information, of which he was the sole possessor, exposing the Tweed ring, he replied: "I don't think the devil will ever make a higher bid for me than that. Nevertheless, I cannot consider any offer not to expose this rascality." We wonder how long any of our newspaper men in these days would hold out against such a temptation.

The horrid fact is sent from Russia that a doctor, supposed to have been dead, was buried alive. On an examination being made, it was discovered that in his struggles the unfortunate victim of the trance state had actually turned on his side in the coffin, had beaten his forehead to a jelly and had bitten his fingers to the bone. The cruel and barbarous treatment of Siberian prisoners, and the starvation in that country, are enough to make all the dead in Russia turn in their coffins, and make the Russian authorities squirm in the other world worse than the poor doctor did in his grave.

Sacramentans appreciate the import of the old phrase "Better late than never," that the local authorities have at last mustered the courage to close down four dives that were notoriously the rendezvous of criminals. THEMIS has from the very first advised the absolute and summary closing of drinking places that menace the lives and property of our citizens, and has called for the rigid enforcement of the vagrancy law. It did seem those in power feared to act. That they have acted, it is now manifest the people were not the ones to be feared. That the wedge has entered, let more powerful blows be struck. The community will save money; there will be little likelihood the city will suffer the disgrace of having repetitions of street murders. Think of Robert Allen!

We have taken little interest in the lengthy articles that appear on the editorial pages of our daily contemporaries upon the subject of the injurious effects of using baking powder because it contains ammonia; we do not presume the people do, for the perverse housewife complacently orders the traduced powder from the grocer, and will not return to yeast. From the earnestness the editors of our contemporaries manifest it will not surprise us if they restrict their diet to crackers and beans. This will work all right until some enemy of Chile will produce an affidavit that the beans in our market are raised with guano, and that that fertilizer contains a large per cent. of ammonia. It is said of Mr. Greeley, when he was a presidential candidate, that he was asked his views on protection, and what he thought of levying a tariff on guano. "Certainly," the agricultural philosopher replied, "I am in favor of protecting our American birds from competition with the priest-ridden and pauper birds of South America." We observe in an exchange that Prof. Garner uses ammonia to subjugate gorillas, and that he has a bag like an exaggerated canteen, filled with concentrated ammonia, with thirty inches of rubber hose and a nozzle attached. If the gorillas try to form a combination and surround him he will shoot some of the ammonia at them and make them respect the peaceful scientist. The fumes from the ammonia will strangle any number of gorillas, and render them temporarily helpless and half-conscious. Whoever has gone foolishly near to a woman's smelling salts may multiply the effect on his nose by 1,000, and get a faint idea as to what Mr. Garner has in store for these gorillas if they act badly. While the gorillas are recovering from their half-strangled condition and talking about it, Mr. Garner's phonograph and graphophone will take down their remarks. He will take pictures of their attitude with the 4x5 camera that he will have in his cage, while the 5x8 camera perched up outside will perpetuate the general scene. We have not yet joined the society for the prevention of cruelty to dumb animals, but suggest if it is necessary to photograph a gorilla, it would be humane to feed him tempting cakes leavened with baking powder—the subjugating power would be the same, and the animal would have a happy expression on his face.

Queer Superstitions of Some Semi-Barbarous Peoples.

In the Caucasian province of Georgia, where a drought has lasted long, marriageable girls are yoked in couples with a yoke on their shoulders, a priest holds the reins, and thus harnessed they wade through rivers, puddles, and marshes praying, screaming, weeping, and laughing.

In the district of Transylvania when the ground is parched with drought, some girls strip themselves naked, and, led by an older woman who is also naked, they steal a harrow and carry it across the field to a brook, where they set it afloat. Next they sit on the harrow and keep a tiny flame burning on it for an hour. Then they leave the harrow in the water and go home.

A similar rain charm is resorted to in India—naked women drag a plow across the field by night. It is not said that they plunge the plow into a stream or sprinkle it with water. But the charm could hardly be complete without it. Sometimes the charm works through an animal.

To procure rain the Peruvians used to set a black sheep in a field, pour chicha over it, and give it nothing to eat till rain fell.

In a district of Sumatra all the women of the village, scantily clad, go to the river, wade into it and splash each other with the water. A black cat is thrown into the water and made to swim about for awhile, then allowed to escape to the bank, pursued by the splashing of the women.

In these cases the color of the animal is part of the charm, being black it will darken the sky with rain clouds. So the Bechuanas burn the stomach of an ox at evening, because, they say, "Black smoke will gather the clouds and cause the rain to come." Timores sacrificed a black pig for rain, a white or red one for sunshine. The Garos offer a black goat on the top of a very high mountain in the time of drought.—Chambers' Journal.

A Geographical Question.

A great deal has been said and written about the woes which the compositor inflicts upon his helpless victims, and, speaking from experience, I know that they are many and varied; but yet "the gifted author" has occasionally to put up with a good deal of annoyance from higher powers than the poor "comp," as the following experience of an intimate friend of mine will prove:

He was the art critic, and he had just sent out an unusually brilliant account of a recent exhibition of paintings to the desk editor, who, not having made much of a study of art, was naturally unfamiliar with the language of the studio, but was preparing to wrestle with his difficult task. He was new at the work, and it was beset with pitfalls. Heading the list was this enigmatical sentence: "A Landscape in Sepia."

"Landscape in Sepia!" shouted the scribe, addressing the sporting editor, who was busily engaged in describing a spirited set-to between two favorite light weights. "Where the deuce is Sepia?"

"Don't know," answered the sporting editor, thoughtfully. "Never heard of the place. Sepia can't be in the United States, or I must have heard of it, surely. It must be in Syria somewhere."

"I don't believe the place exists at all," snapped the puzzled genius at the desk. "I think—"

A heavy fall in the adjoining room broke off the conversation here, and a hurried investigation revealed the art critic in strong convulsions on the floor. He had heard the entire conversation, and was conveyed to his lodging place in an ambulance.—Harpers' Magazine.

German Women.

One of the most striking proofs of the backward state of civilization in Germany is the undoubted inferiority of the women to the men. This is to be noticed in all ranks and conditions of life, and is the more curious since the German usually receives an admirable education, not only in "book-learning," but also in cookery and needle-work. Yet, after her marriage she accepts her position as the "hausfrau" and "hausmutter," with few ideas or aspirations beyond her kitchen and nursery, and no topics of conversation, except the iniquity of her servants and the extravagance of her neighbors. Her husband, on the other hand, is, as a rule, original and intelligent, and would be an agreeable conversationalist if he were not too argumentative and self-opinionated. In theatrical matters the same contrast may be noticed. The actors are invariably better than the actresses, the tenors and baritones outshine the sopranos and contraltos; even the male ballet dancers are more agile and graceful than their short-petticoated colleagues.

There's nothing in size—when a pint bottle can exert more influence over some men than a church spire.

First Comic Paper in the United States.

It was "dear old Frank Bellew," as we youngsters called him, who was the father of comic journalism in America. The name Bellew, inside three lines forming a triangle, in the corner of political and social cartoons, was familiar to the readers of Punch and other English comic weeklies away back in 1850.

There was then no comic paper in the United States, and the American who had a taste for the comic side of life had to be satisfied with imported jokes—far-fetched jokes they might be called—that came to him from across the seas, in the columns of Punch. He chuckled over these at the rate of about twenty-five cents per chuckle; for twenty-five cents was the New York price of a copy of Punch, and no one is known to have ever discovered more than one joke in a copy.

Frank Bellew came to the United States in 1854, and lived in New York until he died, three years ago. He and John Brougham started the first comic paper published in the United States. It was an illustrated weekly called the Lantern, and was modeled after the English comics, even to the publishing of columns of conundrums that were senile and moth-eaten long before Columbus discovered us, pages of petrified puns that had been brought over to England by the Norman invaders, and strings of little three-line witticisms with which Joshua used to amuse his soldiers while they camped outside the walls of Jerico.

Bellew was the artist-in-chief and Brougham was the editor. There was none of what is now known as American humor in the columns of the Lantern; no dialect stories; no short dialogues between the dude and the summer girl, the policeman and the inebriate, the Hebrew clothier and his customer. It is true that the mother-in-law joke and an occasional bon mot regarding the mule were then in existence, but they were used sparingly. The jokes that now constitute the bulk of published American humor had not been discovered. The lonely oyster in the church-fair stew was then unknown, and not a word had been printed about the size of the Chicago girl's foot.

Bellew used to tell us how the chief work on the paper was done. The editor, the artist, and the contributors met once a week and dined in a restaurant in Park row kept by a man named Windhurst. These weekly meetings were for the alleged purpose of evolving ideas for the leading cartoons and most important editorials of the forthcoming number. Around the table sat Brougham, who acted as chairman; Lester Wallace, then the handsomest man in New York; Fitz James O'Brien, poet and journalist; Thomas Powell, an Englishman, admitted to have been the original of Micawber, and described by Bellew as "a man of no little wit and culture, but with an inartistic jocularly, the result, probably, of defective early humorous training;" Walt Whitman, the "good gray poet" of later years, then the Bohemian newspaper writer whose robust form, flowing locks and wide sombrero made him a conspicuous and picturesque figure in New York thirty odd years ago; H. Farrar MacDermott, also a poet and journalist; Thomas Butler Gunn, artist and writer; Charles Gaylor, the playwright. There were others at those dinners, but these were the principal contributors to the Lantern. As I write this Walt Whitman is dying, and all the others named are dead, except Gaylor.

In describing these dinners Bellew used to say: "After we had all partially dulled our faculties with a copious dinner, and impaired our powers of concentration by numerous libations of ale and sherry, the genial Brougham would call the meeting to order."

Then it seems that they smoked and drank ale, and talked and drank ale, and sang songs and drank ale, and made puns and drank ale, and Brougham made a speech and Whitman read a poem, and then they all drank ale out of pewter pots. Then, when some one moved that the matter of the cartoon for next week's issue be discussed, it was discovered that it was time to close the restaurant, and so they took a drink of ale and went home.

The Lantern did not pay, of course, and after a time it passed away, and the man who furnished the paper on which it was printed and the man who had done the presswork mourned exceedingly.—Printer's Ink.

Tools Get Moon-Struck.

It is not generally known that the light of the sun and the moon exercises a deleterious effect on edge tools. Knives, drills, scythes and sickles assume a blue color if they are exposed for some time to the light and heat of the sun; the sharp edge disappears and the tool is rendered absolutely useless unless it is retempered. Purchasers should, therefore, be on their guard against buying tools from retail dealers and peddlers, which, for show purposes, have probably been exposed for days together to the glare of the sun. The unserviceableness of tools acquired under these conditions is generally wrongly attributed to bad material or to inferior workmanship. A similarly prejudicial effect has been exercised by moonlight. An ordinary cross-cut saw is asserted to have been put out of shape in a single night by exposure to the moon.

Athletic Club Masquerade.

The Sacramento Athletic Club will give a grand masquerade carnival and promenade concert in the assembly chamber on Thursday evening, January 28, 1892, the proceeds of which will be used in the erection of a club building. The masquerade will be conducted on a magnificent scale and promises to be one of the finest events ever presented to the people of Sacramento. During its existence the club has furnished splendid entertainment, and we are sure that our people will respond liberally and aid the club in making the affair a financial success.

Counter Romance.

She was romantic. Her father was a millionaire, whose life had been devoted to sausage-making. He was practical naturally, but all the poetry of the family was centered in her. She was beloved by another millionaire's son, but she had been reading romance and stuff, and, when he proposed to her, declared he must do something poetical for her. "Dearest, what can I do?" "Become a poor artist." "I couldn't be any other kind of an artist." "I mean you must pretend to become a poor artist. Pa does not know you. You must come and make love to me and I will fall in love with you. Pa will object and make a row. We will elope and get married, and when it is all over we'll tell him, and it will be delightful."

And so he became a poor artist and took a poor studio and daubed on canvas and pretended to paint pictures. And there was another millionaire's daughter got to coming to his studio and sitting for her picture. In those delightful tete-a-tetes he forgot all about the romantic maiden; and when the romantic maiden came one night in peasant costume as a sweet surprise, to run away with him, she found he was married to the other girl and had gone off on his honeymoon. She thinks that romances are all lies now, and that nothing happens in real life as it happens in books.—London Tid-Bits.

Queer Chinese Marriage Customs.

In one part of the canton of Ticino a very quaint marriage ceremony prevails. The bridegroom dresses in his "Sunday best," and accompanied by as many friends and relatives as he can muster for the fete goes to claim his bride.

Finding the door locked he demands admittance. The inmates ask him his business, and in reply he solicits the hand of his chosen maiden.

If his answer be deemed satisfactory he is successively introduced to a number of matrons and maids, some perhaps deformed and others old and ugly. Then he is presented to some large dolls, all of which he rejects with scorn, amid general merriment. The bewildered bridegroom, whose impetuosity and temper are now sorely tried, is then informed that his lady love is absent, and invited in to see for himself.

He rushes into the house and searches from room to room until he finds her in her bridal dress ready to go to church. Then are his troubles over, and his state as a benedict assured.—Youth's Companion.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Last night the Devil's Auction was presented to a full house. There are many new features in this popular spectacular comedy. The scenery is new, costumes bright and new. The company is excellent. To-night Devil's Auction again.

Dan Sully in The Millionaire is booked for next Wednesday and Thursday at the Metropolitan. This is one of the best of our modern dramas. It is a play of the times, and Dan Sully has a very congenial role. We saw the play at San Francisco, and pronounce it superior.

Manager Washington Norton, of the Clunie Opera House, will open on Monday night with a fine stock company. This will be a new era in theatricals for this city, as manager Norton intends to present continuous and varied programmes, alternating with comedy drama, light opera, and popular plays. The company selected for this new enterprise consists of sterling artists. Mr. Norton's long experience in stage matters is an assurance of the success of his undertaking. Certainly the people of Sacramento should reward the manager with patronage. The people must be amused, and here is an opportunity to have continued amusement, something long needed in the capital city. The Clunie Opera House has been thoroughly refitted and new scenery set up, making the place cheerful and comfortable. Good plays will be given, and good patronage should follow.

One of the rarest and most valuable cameos in the world is now in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. It is a head of Jupiter Aegiochus, dating from the second century A. D., and is exquisitely carved from a single chrysoprase seven inches long by five wide. Antiquarians prize it because it shows both the oak leaves and the aegis, or armor, a combination known in only two other representations of Jupiter. The cameo is a part of the Somerville collection of 2,000 engraved gems and talismans, and is valued at over $50,000.

"There's plenty of room at the top," he said, As he stood by the mirror there, With a brush and a towel in either hand, And parted his seldom hair.

My Angel.

My angel wears no wings; her soft brown hair
Floats like a veil to hide her shoulders fair;
Her step is light, her motion is full of grace,
And ah! could I describe her lovely face,
The rounded cheek, its blush of faintest red,
The aureole light that seems to crown her head,

The lips of perfect shape and lively hue,
The gentle smile that bids you think them true;

Her eyes are blue—the color of the sky—
When days are warm and fleecy clouds ride high;

She has a winning way, the sweetest voice
That ever bade the heart of man rejoice.
She loves at eve along the mead to stray,
To pluck the flowers that spring beside the way,

And loosely twine them in her shining hair.
Though many times I loiter with her there,
In vain I try to whisper of my love;
Bashful and mute, I wander through the grove,

Or speak of flower, or tree, or rock, or bird,
But of herself I cannot breathe a word;
Though never flower was there so fair as she,
Or bird that sang so sweet a song for me.
Last eve, O blessed night! I dreamed of her;
I thought my coward heart forgot its fear,
And spoke the words that begged her for my own.

As we were straying in the grove alone.
The sun was gone, but twilight lingered still;
The rising moon peeped o'er the distant hill,
And all was still, save listening Philomel
Hearing my vows, began her own to tell;
But when I kissed her, in the moonlight's beam,
The vision fled, and lo, it was no dream.

Legend of the Chinese Lilies.

Many, many years ago there lived in China a very rich and very good man. According to the custom of the country and time he had two wives. Each wife had blessed him with a son. He was very happy. Finally, having lived to a good old age, he died and left his estates to his two sons. Now, one of these boys, the younger, was very like his father, being of good and noble spirit; the elder son was evil minded and selfish. Most of the wealth of the father was in lands, of which he owned vast areas. Part of this was rich and fertile and was covered with houses; but a portion was swamp lands, too wet for cultivation, and valueless. Now, when the estates came to be divided the wicked one so planned that he got all the good land and his brother got all the swamp land. The younger brother, unsuspecting, did not know this until too late. For a time the elder brother lived in wealth, while the younger lived in poverty. His poverty became so great that he was near starvation. Lifting up his voice he cried to God for mercy, to know why he was to suffer so while his wicked brother lived in splendor. And lo! an angel appeared and bade him weep not, and told him that his days of poverty were over.

And behold when the morning came, for the angel's visit was in the night, beautiful lilies had sprung up where the angel had stood. These soon spread until all the swamp was covered with them, the lilies growing where nothing else had ever grown. When the story became known, people came from far and wide to see the "angel lilies." Soon it was discovered that if the bulbs were taken away they would grow, and would grow and thrive where other vegetation would die; that they would flourish on water alone. People came from far and near to purchase lilies. As fast as they were taken from the swamps others would grow in their places. An immense traffic sprung up and "angel lilies" were sent to furthestmost parts of the empire. The younger brother waxed rich and powerful. This was many years ago, yet to this day the offspring of the younger brother own that swamp, and are rich from the sale of lilies. And lilies are sent, not only all over the Chinese empire, but over the entire world.

Many people of that country came to believe that, because of the divine origin, the lilies had a significance of their own. That if, on New Year's day, an angel lily was bought and put in water, its development was a forecast of the year for the owner. If no blossoms came, evil would befall the owner; if a few blossoms, a share of good and a share of bad; but if profuse flowers came, the year would be one of continued prosperity.

It is Not Always Beauty that Wins.

There's a girl up on the hill who always gets a seat in the car if it is just jammed. She isn't pretty, nor nothing like that; but she is brainy and her feet are large. She wears common-sense shoes with heavy soles. She goes into a car and hangs to a strap in front of some man. Then every time the car jerks she lunges around with those heels. After a few lunges the man gives her his seat, and limps out and stands on the platform and swears.—St. Paul Daily Globe.

It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. The Girl with the Crayon.

A girl about 18 years of age entered a third-avenue elevated car at the bridge the other day, having a crayon portrait on a stretcher in her hands. She took a seat beside a middle-aged man who had a sleepy look in his eyes, but who roused up just as the train got away and said:

"'Scuse me, but is that a crayon you have there?"

"Yes, sir," she replied in a timid way.

"Thought so. Some of your own work?"

"No, sir."

"Thought so. 'Scuse me. Somebody else's work, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is it crayon portrait of your dear fazzer?" he continued after a bit.

The girl looked up and down the car for another seat and made no reply.

"Or it may be crayon portrait of your dear muzzer?" he suggested.

The girl got up and went to the other end of the car, and the man looked after her in a stupid way and then said to the passenger next to him:

"'Scuse me, but I didn't mean anything. I never see crayon portrait without being deeply affected. I had a muzzer once."

"Quite likely," coldly replied the other.

"I was goin' to present her with crayon portrait of myself for Christmas, but she—she died. Poor muzzer!"

Tears filled his eyes and ran over his cheeks, and, as he failed to find his handkerchief, he wiped them off with a dogskin glove.

"She'd have died when you presented her the portrait, anyhow," heartlessly observed the passenger.

"'Scuse me; is your muzzer dead?" asked the other.

"No."

"Then you can't realize how I feel. I was born with a tender heart. No home is home without a muzzer. I was goin' to present her with portrait next day, but she died. Was I to blame?"

"Perhaps not."

"Can't shee how I was to blame, but it always makes me shad to think of it. 'Scuse me, will you?"

The guard looked in to call out "Ninth street," and, seeing the condition of the man, he took him by the arm and led him out on the platform. The deeply affected son got one arm around a post and used the other hand to wipe away more tears, and he called to the other man through the window:

"'Scuse me, but you'd better shee that girl and speak to her. She may kill her muzzer jes' as I killed mine."

"Go on down with your jag!" exclaimed the guard as he slammed the gates.

"Jag! Jag! Have I got jag? Where's jag? Shee that girl afore it is too late. I had crayon portrait all ready for Christmas, and she died—my dear ole muzzer fell right off her chair and died. 'Scuse me, but I was born tender—"

The ticket-chopper had him by the back of the neck and was heading him for the stairs as the train moved off.—M. Quad, in New York World.

He Failed to Catch On.

An amusing incident occurred in a New-ark music store the other day. A new and very pretty ballad is entitled "Kiss Me." A very pretty girl, having heard of the song and thinking she would get it with some others, stopped into a music store to make a purchase. One of the clerks, a modest young man, stepped up to wait on her. The young lady threw her veil back, saying:

"I want 'Rock Me to Sleep.'"

The clerk got the song and put it before her.

"Now," said the young lady, "I want 'Wandering Refugee.'"

"Yes, ma'am," said the clerk, bowing; and in a few minutes he produced the "Refugee."

"Now, 'Kiss Me,'" said the young lady, meaning, of course, the song above mentioned.

The poor clerk's eyes almost popped fire as he looked at the young lady in astonishment, for he was not aware of the fact that a song by that name had been written.

"Wh—what did you say, miss?"

"'Kiss Me,'" said she.

"I can't do it, miss; I never kissed a young lady in my life," said the clerk.

About that time a veil dropped, a young lady left in a hurry, the clerk felt sick, and the proprietor lost the sale of some music.—Young Ladies' Fashion Bazar.

The world contains bushels and bushels of jolly good fellows. Some of them are in prison; others are not, but ought to be; some are in Europe, and some in Canada, Mexico and South America. The jolly good fellow smiles and smirks and smirks and smiles like a dream in a sun dog. He is a quilted dancing jack and as conscienceless as a sheep tick. He fingers for fancy and fables for flattery. When he sneezes he flips the trip hammer of senseless adulation, and when he scrapes he unjoints pig-headed mannerisms and upsets the jurisprudence of the freckled fluke. He is the tag end of a d—n fool, with just enough mischief to play the devil. Out upon the jolly good fellow, except as a plaything for sucklings.

A Social Tragedy.

The following is from Harper's Magazine for January:

SCENE I.—Fifth avenue, New York. Madge and Daisy walking toward Delmonico's. An elderly gentleman approaching from opposite direction.

MADGE. "Why, there's old Stuart Meanboy! Wonder if he's going to Del's?"

DAISY. "Don't know; but, anyway, just see me get a lunch out of him." (To Mr. Meanboy.) "Oh, how do you do? I'm so delighted to see you!"

MR. MEANBOY (shaking hands, and dropping his monocle). "Ah, Miss Daisy, Miss Sandy; charmed to meet you. [All stop in front of Delmonico's.] Were you going to lunch here?"

MADGE. "We did think of it, but—er—" DAISY. "Yes, we had thought of it, but—er—"

MR. M. Oh, do come in with me, and let me show you what a good lunch I can order for you."

DAISY (casting a triumphant, "I-told-you-so" glance at Madge). "We hardly like to—er—"

MR. M. (interrupting). "No trouble at all, my dear young lady; no trouble at all, I assure you."

SCENE II.—Madge and Daisy, murmuring thanks, follow him into the restaurant, and seat themselves at table.

MR. M. "Waiter, bring me a bill of fare. Now, what will you have first—bouillon?"

DAISY (nudging Madge). "Oysters are good to start with—don't you think so?"

MR. M. "Capital! Then bouillon and croquettes."

DAISY (beaming). "That is a splendid beginning. What afterwards?"

MR. M. "Miss Sandy must choose next."

MADGE (with a coquettish smile, after searching for an expensive dish). "Shall it be squab and French pea?"

MR. M. "Immense! Nothing more appetizing. You are an epicure, Miss Madge."

[Madge smiles sweetly at him, and she and Daisy exchange kicks under the table.]

DAISY. "It is your turn, Mr. Meanboy."

MR. M. "How kind of you to rely upon my judgment! but really, Miss Daisy, you must suit yourself."

DAISY (to Madge). "Is there anything else you would like?"

MADGE. "No. I must insist upon Mr. Meanboy choosing a dish. I should feel so badly if he did not."

MR. M. "Then let us make it a terrine de fois gras and salad, and finish up with ices and coffee."

THE GIRLS (in unison). "Oh, Mr. Meanboy, you are too thoughtful!"

[Mr. M. beams upon them, and suggests champagne as a drink.]

MADGE. "How nice! We never thought of that."

MR. M. (orders champagne, and rises). "Well, I can congratulate myself upon having ordered as good a lunch as you could get anywhere. I'm afraid I shall have to leave you now, as I have an engagement to lunch with a fellow at the club at two o'clock."

[Exit Mr. M.]

DAISY (faintly). "How much money have you, Madge?"

MADGE (dumping contents of her purse on the table, announces, in an agitated undertone). "One dollar and seventy cents. How much have you?"

DAISY (hopelessly). "One dollar, ninety."

[They simultaneously seize a menu, and commence adding up the cost of their lunch. At the end of five minutes they gaze dumbly at each other—total, ten dollars and thirty five cents. Tableau—Curtain!]

Proud of a Family Trait.

Seated in a Philadelphia café a night or two ago was a member of a strange family. The gentleman in question is a brilliant lawyer, and would undoubtedly make his mark in the world were it not for a unique family pride which keeps him almost constantly under the influence of stimulants. In fact, for generations the family has been addicted to the liquor habit, and the present generation appears to glory in the ancestral record. The lawyer in question has in his residence portraits in oil of his father, grandfather and great-grandfather. When entertaining visitors he points to these pictures with such proud soliloquies as this: "Now there was my grandfather. Isn't he a beauty? He died drunk. That old duck over there is my great-grandfather. What a superb drinker that old man was! Fell down stairs at the age of 92 and broke his neck. This one is my father. He died of delirium tremens." But the chief delight of this eccentric individual is to get an old uncle drunk. The old man is 85. The nephew takes delight in showing him off to visitors, pointing out the old man's points just as one would a horse. "Isn't he a beauty!" he will exclaim admiringly as the veteran gives a lurch. "Just look at him stagger! Isn't that old man a beauty?" There are strange instances of family pride, but this is undoubtedly the strangest on record.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Of late much has been printed in ephemeral literature concerning the prevalence of political corruption, particularly that which has affected members of the legislature. The bald truth is, that there exists much of corruption, and very much more than the people have any conception of, in the management of political primaries and conventions, and in legislative bodies, both state and national. We can dismiss the federal legislature in a short paragraph: Wealth, not title by brains, is the "Open, sesame!" to the American house of lords; upon the portal might with appropriateness be inscribed, "No statesman need apply." The lower house is weighted down with numbers; there honors are alike easy and empty. To come to our state legislatures of recent years (do our readers say, "Close the book?"). There is much of interest in the history of our state, that was born, it might be said, with a golden spoon in its mouth. In the days of yore men were elected to the legislature, that they were fitted for the important position by reason of marked ability and integrity. There did come a change. Why did it come, and from what cause? The history is brief, and its tracement is of ease. In 1867 came the first open demonstration of the effort of a railroad corporation to control the politics of the state, and it was made in the republican party. Gorham, the railroad candidate, was nominated for governor, over Bidwell, by the convention of that party. Incidentally, we will say Bidwell could have secured the nomination had he given heed to the advice of his friends and thawed the ice with which he was incrustured. It was the party split and Fay was nominated by the true-blue Republicans. Haight, the democratic nominee, was elected by the people upon an anti-railroad platform. In 1871 Booth, anti-railroad, was nominated, over Selby, by the republican convention, and he was elected over Haight. It was the toss of a penny which of the two nominees was the more objectionable to the corporation, and Booth was supported that he was a new man, while Haight had been tried and found wanting in the element of subserviency. The administration of Booth was, if anything, more unsatisfactory to the corporate power than had been that of Haight.

Then it was bolder tactics were adopted. Newspapers were established or bought up; political managers employed to control primaries and conventions, and systematic work was commenced at the very bottom of our political system. No offices, however small, were overlooked. They were valuable, that they afforded rewards to the faithful. The opposition was awed; the more obdurate were subdued by business persecution. Particularly did that state of affairs exist in this city and county. The machinery of the republican party was captured and placed into the control of men who are now remembered but with execration. There soon came rebellion of the people, and in 1873 the independent party swept the state and elected the legislature. Matters took a change in 1875. In anticipation of the gubernatorial election in that year, desperate measures were resorted to. It had become necessary to silence the Sacramento Union, a journal long established and of influence. An opposition paper had been established against it that had the backing of unlimited capital. The struggle lasted for years, and on February 20, 1875, the Union succumbed. It is impossible to estimate how much this conquest cost the corporation, but the sum must have been very considerable. The old Union went down as did the "Cumberland," with its colors flying. In its last issue it said:

The Union has constantly aimed at two things: To protect and elevate the character of the common people, and reform abuses by which they are made to suffer at the hands of bad men. It would have been much easier and very much more profitable to the paper to have drifted with the general current of corruption, and let the people take care of themselves, or assist the false-hearted in cajoling them. It did not escape our observation that this was the road to fortune and riches; nor yet that it was the way to dishonor and treason to the public. The reader need not be told which path the Union took. That we are now—after a long and tolerably successful struggle against the banded cohorts of a piratical and powerful corporation at league with men of a low and groveling nature, content to be slaves and menials of an overbearing, ignorant, brutal and exacting master—at last compelled to withdraw from the paper and give up the fight is a convincing proof that our course has been governed by considerations of honor and duty, and not of gain.

The Union had, early in the year, predicted that Irwin would be elected governor, and that Farley would be sent to the United States Senate in reward for their service in the state legislature with regard to the bills looking to a regulation of the rates of freights and fares. The prediction was verified. Irwin was elected governor over Phelps and Bidwell, and a democratic legislature was chosen that returned Farley. Things went on swimmingly until 1878, when the workmen's movement took head, and, while the medicine was severe, it was for a time efficacious. The result was the adoption of the new constitution, and had it not been for the formation of side-parties the republican party would have suffered defeat. Perkins, however, was elected governor in 1879. In 1882 the current of popular opinion again manifested itself, and both political parties passed stong anti-railroad resolutions. Estee, the republican gubernatorial nominee, delivered a bitter anti-railroad address before the convention, and it has been said that when the powers addressed him a note of inquiry as to his stand, he sent back a blank sheet of paper in an envelope. However that may be, the forces were turned against him, and the railroad newspapers openly attacked him, but in some counties sought to carry the republican legislative ticket. Stoneman, democrat, was elected governor, and a democratic legislature chosen.

Whatever may be said of legislatures of late, the one of 1883 is perhaps entitled to the palm as "being out for the stuff." A very pretty romance has been published entitled "Frankenstein," wherein it is related an ingenious artizan manufactured an artificial man; of course, the creation was not perfect. It had the bones, the muscles, and the other physical attributes; reason was but partial—enough, however, that the being realized it was not of normal origin, and that it was loathed by those naturally born. It conceived resentment against its maker, and sought his life. The builder of the Frankenstein found he had created a monster, and endowed it with a power he could not control; flee where he might, the menace followed him, and it did cause his destruction. In the creation of the legislature of 1883 the corporation builded a Frankenstein; the men it had selected as tools sought the mastery, and like the bulls of Lord Peter, in Dean Swift's "Tale of a Tub," would not be pacified "till you flung them a bit of gold." That the maker of this legislative Frankenstein was severely bled to prevent the passage of "cinch" bills is a matter the people do not regret; it was a deserved lesson, and the corporation was admonished to go a little slow.

Since there has been the profession: "We are out of politics; let the people act uninfluenced; let our elections be pure." Does the Southern Pacific company keep aloof from politics? Not as we have had opportunity to observe, particularly in the selection of members of the legislature. We are not disposed to dispute the right of any individual or corporation to engage in politics as a matter of self-protection; that is eminently proper; but we have never seen the sense of the company interesting itself in political matters where it can have no earthly concern, and where favoritism to one or more candidates will inevitably lead to the estrangement of the defeated. It is a patent fact there are all over the state, and particularly in the cities, men who make politics a trade and who sell their influence. In this city one blindfolded can place his fingers upon them. These political harlots do organize the base element of society, and they have been able to produce so many votes for so much money. Debased as these men are, those who should feel polluted by association with them hesitate not to barter for their chattels.

It is well enough to say—and truly it is so—that the fault lies with the better element, that they do not attend to the duty citizenship casts upon them; but can we ever hope the people will pay the attention they should to political matters? That which is everybody's business is the business of nobody, has been written. It is not true. Politics is the business of every citizen. It is neglected by the majority; it is made a business by a few, many of whom would not be trusted in responsible positions in private life.

We have great hope the new election law will correct abuses that have existed; but it will not reach primaries and conventions, and there is where much mischief is done. We do not believe in witchcraft, yet feel, did the Witch of Endor live, the good people would be justified in following the example of Saul and calling up the spirit of Samuel for advice. Perhaps it would be the disquieted spirit would answer as it did to Saul, that it is too late to correct the error, and that the Philistines will prevail. It may be the people would faint at the prophecy, and that there would be necessity to feed them on the fatted calf and the unleavened bread to revive them.

Were it the evil stopped with the feeling of the political cormorants, it would not be particularly serious; but there have been results that have been extremely costly. At times incompetent men have been elevated to positions of official power; at times there have been those selected who made no pretext of honesty.

Much has been said concerning the last legislature. It was no worse than its predecessors for many years back. The only distinction is they were caught at their tricks. It is much the same as in ordinary life: a man may be generally known to be a trickster or a rouse, and all will go well—he may, in fact, be admired—until he is caught out, and then the finger of scorn is pointed at him. We would much like to believe that the railroad company is in good faith out of politics, but we must have evidence to convince us of it. If it will assist in giving the state a few more legislatures such as we have had of late years, it may be the menacing words "Mene, mene, tekem, upharsin" may appear upon the wall of the banqueting hall. The danger will come from two quarters: men who will sell themselves when in office will not always stay bought, and in all likelihood will at the first opportunity strike at the hand that has feed them; the natural jealousy of large accumulations of wealth, as well as a feeling that injustice has been done, will array the great mass of the people against the corporation. Public sentiment is not expressed by the press on this subject, for the reason that most of the papers are either directly or indirectly under railroad control, or are afraid to speak out from apprehension of loss of business.

One reading the daily telegraphic news would naturally think the world is getting very bad; but the sentiment expressed by an eastern journalist puts the matter in its true light: Look over your morning paper and you receive the impression that the world is filled with crime and disaster. You lay it aside with a feeling almost of despair. But you were abroad all day yesterday, threading miles of streets and mingling with thousands of people, and you saw no crime committed. You did see, however, enough of duty done, of kindly helpfulness, of cheerful self-sacrifice in time, convenience and service, to have filled a dozen newspapers with the recital of them. Here are columns of the papers filled for weeks with the doings of one woman who is said to have poisoned her husband. Well, you know of some wife whose daily self-sacrifice for a helpless husband would furnish materials of noble heroism for a volume; but such devotion is so common as to pass without comment. Wifely devotion is not "news," while wifely infidelity is news, and there is a deep, hopeful, reassuring meaning in it. It would be a bad world if it had to be raked all over every day to find good deeds sufficient to fill a newspaper.

THE VOICE OF SCIENCE.

Mrs. Esdaile of the Lindens, Birchspool, was a lady of quite remarkable scientific attainments. As honorary secretary of the ladies' branch of the local Eclectic Society she shone with a never-failing brilliance. It was even whispered that on the occasion of the delivery of Prof. Tomlinson's suggestive lecture on the "Perigenesis of the Plastidule" she was the only woman in the room who could follow the lecturer even as far as the end of his title.

Rose Esdaile had just passed her twentieth year, and was looked upon as one of the beauties of Birchspool. Her face was, perhaps, a trifle long for perfect symmetry, but her eyes were fine, her expression kindly and her complexion beautiful. It was an open secret, too, that she had under her father's will £500 a year in her own right. With such advantages a far plainer girl than Rose Esdaile might create a stir in the society of a provincial town.

A scientific conversazione in a private house is an onerous thing to organize, yet mother and daughter had not shrunk from the task. On the morning of which I write they sat together surveying their accomplished labors, with the pleasant feeling that nothing remained to be done save to receive the congratulations of their friends.

With the assistance of Rupert, the son of the house, they had assembled from all parts of Birchspool objects of scientific interest, which now adorned the long tables in the drawing-room. Indeed, the full tide of curiosities of every sort which had swelled into the house had overflowed the rooms devoted to the meeting, and had surged down the broad stairs to invade the dining-room and the passage. The whole villa had become a museum.

"You've really managed it splendidly, ma," said the young lady, craning her neck up to give her mother a congratulatory kiss. "It was so brave of you to undertake it."

"I think that will do," purred Mrs. Esdaile, complacently. "But I do hope that the phonograph will work without a hitch. You know at the last meeting of the British Association I got Prof. Standerton to repeat into it his remarks on the history of Medusiform Gonophore."

"How funny it seems," exclaimed Rose, glancing at the square, box-like apparatus which stood in the post of honor on the central table, "to think that this wood and metal will begin to speak just like a human being."

"Hardly that, dear. Of course the poor thing can say nothing except what is said to it. You always know exactly what is coming. But I do hope that it will work all right."

"Rupert will see to it when he comes up from the garden. He understands all about them. Oh, ma, I feel so nervous."

Mrs. Esdaile looked anxiously down at her daughter and passed her hand caressingly over her rich, brown hair. "I understand," she said in her soothing, cooing voice, "I understand."

"He will expect an answer to-night, ma."

"Follow your heart, child. I am sure that I have every confidence in your good sense and discretion. I would not dictate to you upon such a matter."

"You are so good, ma. Of course, as Rupert says, we really know very little of Charles—of Capt. Beesly. But then, ma, all that we do know is in his favor."

"Quite so, dear. He is musical and well informed and good-humored, and certainly handsome. It is clear, too, from what he says, that he has moved in the very highest circles."

"The best in India, ma. He was an intimate friend of the governor general's. You heard yourself what he said yesterday about the D'Arcies and Lady Gwendoline Fairfax and Lord Montague Grosvenor."

"Well, dear," said Mrs. Esdaile, resignedly, "you are old enough to know your own mind. I shall not attempt to dictate to you. I own that my own hopes were set upon Prof. Stares."

"Oh, ma, think how dreadfully ugly he is."

"But think of his reputation, dear. Little more than thirty and a member of the royal society."

"I couldn't, ma. I don't think I could if there was not another man in the world. But, oh, I do feel so nervous; for you can't think how earnest he is. I must give him an answer to-night. But they will be here in an hour. Don't you think we had better go to our rooms?"

The two ladies had risen when there came a quick, masculine step upon the stairs, and a brisk young fellow with curly black hair dashed into the room.

"All ready?" he asked, running his eyes over the lines of relic-strewn tables.

"All ready, dear," answered his mother.

"Oh, I am glad to catch you together," said he, with his hands buried deeply in his trousers pockets and an uneasy expression on his face. "There's one thing that I wanted to speak to you about. Look here, Rosie, a bit of fun is all very well, but you wouldn't be such a little donkey as to think seriously of this fellow Beesly?"

"My dear Rupert, do try to be a little less abrupt," said Mrs. Esdaile, with a deprecating hand outstretched.

"I can't help seeing how they have been thrown together. I don't want to be unkind, Rosie, but I can't stand by and see you wreck your life for a man who has nothing to recommend him but his eyes and mustache. Do be a sensible girl and have nothing to say to him."

"It is surely a point, Rupert, upon which I am more fitted to decide than you can be," remarked Mrs. Esdaile, with dignity.

"No, mother, for I have been able to make some inquiries. Young Cheffington of the gunners knew him in India. He says"—

But his sister broke in upon his revelations. "I won't stay here, ma, to hear him slandered behind his back," she cried with spirit. "He has never said anything that was not kind of you, Rupert, and I don't know why you should attack him so. It is cruel, unbrotherly."

With a sweep and a whisk she was at the door, her cheeks flushed, her eyes sparkling, her bosom heaving with this little spurt of indignation, while close at her heels walked her mother with soothing words and an angry glance thrown back over her shoulder. Rupert Esdaile stood with his hands burrowing deeper and deeper into his pockets and his shoulders rising higher and higher to his ears, feeling intensely guilty, and yet not certain whether he should blame himself for having said too much, or for not having said enough.

Just in front of him stood the table on which the phonograph, with wires, batteries, and all complete, stood ready for the guests whom it was to amuse. Slowly his hands emerged from his pockets as his eye fell upon the apparatus, and with languid curiosity he completed the connection and started the machine. A pompous, husky sound, as of a man clearing his throat, proceeded from the instrument, and then in high, piping tones, thin, but distinct, the commencement of the celebrated scientist's lecture.

"Of all the interesting problems," remarked the box, "which are offered to us by recent researches in the lower orders of marine life, there is none to exceed the retrograde metamorphosis which characterizes the common barnacle. The differentiation of an amorphous protoplasmic mass"—Here Rupert Esdaile broke the connection again, and the funny little tinkling voice ceased as suddenly as it began.

The young man stood smiling, looking down at this garrulous piece of wood and metal, when suddenly the smile broadened and a light of mischief danced up into his eyes. He slapped his thigh and danced round in ecstasy of one who has stumbled on a brand-new, brilliant idea.

Very carefully he drew forth the slips of metal which recorded the learned professor's remarks and laid them aside for future use. Into the slots he thrust virgin plates, all ready to receive an impression, and then, bearing the phonograph under his arm, he vanished into his own sanctum. Five minutes before the first guest had arrived the machine was back upon the table and all ready for use.

There could be no question of the success of Mrs. Esdaile's conversazione. From first to last everything went admirably. People stared through microscopes, and linked hands for electric shocks, and marveled at the Gallapagos turtle, the os frontis of the Bos montis, and all the other curiosities which Mrs. Esdaile had taken such pains to collect. Groups formed and chatted round the various cases.

The Dean of Birchspool listened with a protesting lip while Prof. Maunders held forth upon a square of triassic rock, with side thrusts occasionally at the six days of orthodox creation; a knot of specialists disputed over a stuffed ornithorhynchus in a corner; while Mrs. Esdaile swept from group to group, introducing, congratulating, laughing, with the ready, graceful tact of a clever woman of the world. By the window sat the heavily mustached Capt. Beesly, with the daughter of the house, and they discussed a problem of their own, as old as the triassic rock, and perhaps as little understood.

"But I must really go and help my mother to entertain, Capt. Beesly," said Rose, at last, with a movement as if to rise.

"Don't go, Rose. And don't call me Capt. Beesly; call me Charles."

"Well, then, Charles."

"How prettily it sounds from your lips! No, now, don't go. I can't bear to be away from you. I had heard of love, Rose; but how strange it seems that I, after spending my life amid all that is sparkling and gay, should only find out now, in this little provincial town, what love really is!"

"You say so, but it is only a passing fancy."

"No, indeed. I shall never leave you, Rose—never, unless you drive me away from your side. And you would not be so cruel—you would not break my heart!"

He had very plaintive blue eyes, and there was such a depth of sorrow in them as he spoke that Rose could have wept for sympathy. "I should be sorry to cause you grief in any way," she said in a faltering tone.

"Then promise"—

"No, no; we cannot speak of it just now, and they are collecting around the phonograph. Do come and listen to it. It is so funny. Have you ever heard one?"

"Never."

"It will amuse you immensely; and I am sure you would never guess what it is going to talk about."

"What, then?"

"Oh, I won't tell you. You shall hear. Let us have these chairs by the open door, it is so nice and cool."

The company had formed an expectant circle around the instrument. There was a subdued hush as Rupert Esdaile made the connection, while his mother waved her white hand slowly from left to right to make the cadence of the sonorous address which was to break upon their ears.

"How about Lucy Araminta Pennyfeather?" cried a squeaky little voice. There was a rustle and a titter among the audience. Rupert glanced across at Capt. Beesly. He saw a drooping jaw, two protruding eyes and a face the color of cheese.

"How about little Martha Hovendean of the Kensal choir union?" cried the piping voice.

Louder still rose the titters. Mrs. Esdaile stared about her in bewilderment. Rose burst out laughing, and the captain's jaw dropped lower still, with a tinge of green upon the cheeselike face.

"Who was it who hid the ace in the artillery card-room at Peshawar? Who was it who was broke in consequence? Who was it?"

"Good gracious!"—cried Mrs. Esdaile, "what nonsense is this? The machine is out of order. Stop it, Rupert. These are not the professor's remarks. But, dear me, where is our friend Capt. Beesly gone?"

"I am afraid that he is not very well, ma," said Rose. "He rushed out of the room."

"There can't be much the matter," quoth Rupert.

"There he goes, cutting down the avenue as fast as his legs will carry him. I do not think, somehow, that we shall see the captain again. But I must really apologize. I have put in the wrong slips. These, I fancy, are those which belong to Prof. Standerton's lecture."

Rose Esdaile has become Rose Stares now, and her husband is one of the most rising scientists in the provinces. No doubt she is proud of his intellect and of his growing fame, but there are times when she still gives a thought to the blue-eyed captain, and marvels at the strange and manner in which he deserted her.

Louis XIV, playing at backgammon, had a doubtful throw; a dispute arose, and the surrounding courtiers remained all silent. The Count de Grammont happened to come in that instant. "Decide the matter," said the king to him. "Sire," said the count, "your majesty is in the wrong." "How," replied the king, "can you thus decide without knowing the question?" "Because," said the count, "had the matter been doubtful, all these gentlemen present would have given it to your majesty."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Atlas was the first leading gentleman. He supported Earth in her great roll.

Actors and lovers have one trait in common. They often "make up" with each other.

Patti's hair is black this year. Let us hope that it has not gone into full mourning over Patti's voice.

In the London Gaiety theater all women occupying seats on the first floor and in the first balcony are requested to remove their hats. A refusal would oblige them to go to the upper galleries, where hats are allowed.

An agent for a rural play visited a Long Island farmer a few days ago to hire a pair of steers with which to impart realism to the performance. When the farmer learned that they were to appear in a playhouse he refused to let them go, saying that the devil was in charge of all the theaters. An offer of $50 obliterated all fear of the devil, however.

Miss Sibyl Sanderson has captured the Russians at St. Petersburg. Her rendition of Esclarmonde was received with great favor. Our California girl should give her old home a visit. We think she owes it to the friends and associates of her childhood's days to let them hear her marvelous voice before the world's praises have been raised much higher.

Maud Granger, a finished actress, and a former member of the famous Diplomacy company, which included those great artists, Montague, Shannon, Warde, and Jeffreys-Lewis, will hold the boards of the Metropolitan theater on Monday and Tuesday nights, January 25 and 26. Maud Granger now ranks among the leading actresses of the day. Inherited is the principal play in her repertoire, and will be presented Monday night.

The text of Pietro Mascagni's new opera, L'Amico Fritz, was written by Nicola Daspuro, a clever young journalist and poet in Naples. The text is little more than a translation of Friend Fritz, the work of Erckmann and Chatrian. The owners of the copyrighted work at first demanded 60,000 francs and 5 per cent. of the total receipts of the opera for the privilege of using it as the text. Mascagni declined to accept these terms and was on the point of abandoning the piece entirely when a compromise was reached.

Prof. F. Nicholls Crouch, who composed the music for many famous songs, but for none more famous than "Cathleen Mavourneen," is a veteran of 83 years. He is a man of medium stature and stoutly built, with coal-black eyes and few indications, even in his slowly whitening hair, of his great age. He has been four times married, and has been the father of 33 children. One child, the first of his second marriage, was the notorious Cora Pearl of Paris.

A newspaper man in Augusta, Ga., went to hear the Juch company sing Tannhauser. Then he went to the office and wrote several things, among which was this: "We are even inclined to deal gently with the young man with a cold who was a substitute in the title role. If he had simply made signs instead of trying to sing, or had died in the first act, his forgiveness would have been assured; but between him and the stout-whiskered Gambrinus, who posed as Lord Ham and Gravy, there was almost sufficient ground for mob violence. On the whole, we are glad the audience refrained from lynching either, and we suppose it was because the people were too drowsy for such vigorous measures. But we'll let that pass and say simply that we are not educated up to 'Vagner.'"

The Clunie Opera House reopened on Monday night under the management of Mr. Washington Norton. While the company had never played together before, there were no jars nor breaks. All was smooth, and the ladies and gentlemen evinced the fact that they are painstaking artists. The introductory drama was For His Natural Life. Without desiring to criticize the play or its production, it occurs to us that a sparkling comedy would have been more to the public taste than a heavy melodrama. Comedy is always best to introduce a good company. The Clunie Opera House company is evidently equal to any line, comedy or tragedy, and we give it as our judgment that comedy at the start would have been more popular. However, the drama, For His Natural Life, was well staged, and each member of the company was equal to the respective role assigned. Next week the management will introduce new plays and novelties, during which his leading lady, Miss Sterling, will be seen. Miss Sterling did not appear at the opening. Mr. Ingo Tyrrell makes a splendid stage manager. The business men of Sacramento should see to it that Mr. Norton's enterprise is encouraged and patronized. Nothing tends to attract visitors more than places of amusement. With the strong company now engaged at the Clunie, there is every probability of continued entertainment for the lovers of the drama.

There are 587 languages spoken in Europe.

The waste basket is filled with the self conceit of the editor and other poems.

The Bible has now been translated into sixty-six of the languages and dialects of Africa.

Wordsworth was no reader. He once said he had not spent five shillings for books in as many years. He went to school to nature and humanity.

William Morris, the English poet, who is deemed a probable successor to Lord Tennyson in the laureatship, is the manager of a factory for wall paper, has a profitable bric-a-brac shop and owns several shares in a successful magazine.

The fact that Mr. Rudyard Kipling is sometimes betrayed into making childish and silly remarks about Americans does not constitute sufficient ground for the assertion that his books are tiresome. Far from it. They are exceptionally clever.

Phrenologist—Your bump of imagination is abnormally large, sir. You should write poetry. Visitor—I do write poetry. Only yesterday I took a poem to an editor, and that bump you are feeling is where he hit me. Don't bear on it so hard.

Among the periodicals now published by the Johns Hopkins university in Baltimore are the American Chemical Journal, the American Journal of Mathematics and the American Journal of Philology. A large number of professors of the university are contributors to these periodicals.

The "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the Russian social question is what Hall Caine hopes his new novel will be, and it is not forbidden to any to hope. Mr. Caine wears a Vandyke beard and has auburn hair. He is just 41 and began life as an architect. He has been called "the Victor Hugo of English literature" on the strength of "The Deemster" and "The Bondsman."

The English language is full of pitfalls for the foreign student of its intricacies. The Boston Commonwealth tells that a private tutor recently showed a young German pupil's rendering of the familiar lines, "Tell me not in mournful numbers life is but an empty dream." His pupil had bent all his energies to the work of translation, and this was the result: "Tell me not in sadful poetry life is the larger end of a vain imagine."

Gladstone will be known as a Greek scholar as long as his fame as a statesman shall endure, and were he no statesman at all he would still be famous as an author. Yet great statesmen are rarely great authors. It is said with all seriousness that Chatham and Pitt, Wilberforce, Fox and O'Connell, "have left nothing which lives in literature." Burke, the orator, statesman and author, left speeches that will live with those of Demosthenes.

The demise of the London Browning society is announced. Organized to study the poetry of Robert Browning, the more they studied it the more incomprehensible it became. Compared with their work the translation of obscure Greek plays and Egyptian hieroglyphics was a pure pastime. At last they reached the sage conclusion that the game was not worth the candle, and now the Browning fad flourishes nowhere outside of Boston.

In his new novel, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," Mr. Thomas Hardy has a passage relating to the emigration of the agricultural classes which offers a somewhat novel explanation. It was penned, we believe, before the recent discussion arose, and is the more noteworthy because of the writer's long and careful study of life in the southwestern counties, and the fact that he belongs to no political party. "All the mutations," he observes, "so increasingly discernible in village life did not originate entirely in the agricultural unrest. A depopulation was also going on. The village had formerly contained, side by side with the agricultural laborers, an interesting and better-informed class ranking distinctly above the former—the class to which Tess' father and mother had belonged—and including the carpenter, the smith, the shoemaker, the huckster, together with nondescript workers other than farm laborers; a set of people who owed a certain stability of aim and conduct to the fact of their being lifeholders, like Tess' father, or copyholders, or occasionally small freeholders. But as the long holdings fell in they were seldom again let to similar tenants, and were mostly pulled down if not absolutely required by the farmer for his hands. Cottagers who were not directly employed on the land were looked upon with disfavor, and the banishment of some starved the trade of others, who were thus obliged to follow. These families, who had formed the backbone of the village life in the past, had to seek refuge in the large centers—the process humorously designated by statisticians as 'the tendency of the rural population toward the large towns,' being really the tendency of water to flow uphill when forced by machinery."

Physicians of standing in Europe now employ hypnotism for the cure of drunkenness and the opium habit.

An old school friend of Prof. Tyndall says that in his boyhood days the great scientist used to "walk home with teacher" after school and amuse while sometimes puzzling the pedagogue by demonstrating problems in Euclid in the snow.

John Randolph was lying on a sofa in the parlor of a tavern, waiting for the stage to come to the door. A dandified chap stepping into the room with a whip in his hand, just come from a drive, and, standing before the mirror, arranged his hair and collar, quite unconscious of the presence of the gentleman on the sofa. After attitudinizing a while, he turned to go out, when Mr. Randolph asked him, "Has the stage come?" "Stage, sir! stage!" said the fop; "I've nothing to do with it, sir!" "Oh, I beg your pardon!" said Randolph, quietly; "I thought you were the driver."

Billy Gett when first admitted to practice had a very exalted and important air about him. One day in justice's court he had a case in which his father was a witness against his side of the case. The father was called, and when Billy Gett commenced to cross-examine the old gentleman, he asked, "What is your name?" The answer was, W. A. Gett, Sr., sir." "Live in Sacramento?" "Yes." "Are you married?" "Now, look here," said Mr. Gett pere, "I'd like to know where you would be if I wasn't married." Young Billy found it would not do to go too far with the old stock, so dropped the cross-examination. Billy still retains his dignity and good opinion of himself, and is among the leading members of our present bar.

Judges should in all cases take care that the punishment does not exceed the guilt, and that some may not suffer for offenses which, when committed by others, are allowed to pass with impunity. Cicero, in one of his famous orations, gave utterance to sentiments in substance as above. We quote from that great orator of the classic era in the vernacular: Cavendum est ne major poena, quam culpa, sit; et ne usdem de causis alii ne appelenter quidem. In very many criminal cases the various courts of our country allow prejudice and a lack of proper discretion to rule their judgments. Even in the early days of Rome, Cicero took occasion to admonish against such displays of passion and prejudice.

"They while with partial aim their censure moves, Acquit the vultures, but condemn the doves."

They are telling a queer story of the verdancy of the late Senator Plumb on business matters while a young man, says the Buffalo Inquirer. He had scraped together $100, and had it on deposit in a local bank. Wanting to use the money he one day asked the president of the bank for it. He told Plumb to sign a check. The young man looked up and said: "Eh?" "Make out a check for the amount and sign it," remarked the banker. "No, sir-ee!" said the statesman in embryo. "no, sir-ee, I don't put my name on paper unless I keep the paper. I gave you my money without taking your receipt, and I want it back on the same terms." And it took considerable arguing to persuade him that it was the customary thing to make checks for money. But when years went on the senator rose to the million rank by smart business faculty, and could sign checks with almost anybody.

The following anecdote of Daniel Webster, who was, in 1796, a member of Phillips Exeter academy, says the Boston Globe, was related to a friend of mine by Samuel Lawrence, of Exeter: A few days after Mr. Webster had entered Exeter academy he returned to his boarding house one evening in a very despondent mood and told his friends there that the city boys in the academy were constantly laughing at him because he was at the foot of his class and had come from the backwoods. The next day Mr. Nicholas Emery, who was then an assistant tutor in the academy, urged Webster to think of nothing but his books, and added that all would yet come out right. The advice was heeded, and at the end of the first quarter Mr. Emery, mustering his class in a line, formally took the arm of young Webster and marched him from the foot to the extreme head. At the end of the second quarter, when the class was mustered, Mr. Emery said: "Daniel Webster, gather up your books and take down your cap." The boy obeyed, and, thinking that he was about to be expelled from school, was sorely troubled. The teacher soon dispelled the illusion, for he continued: "Now, sir, you will please report yourself to the teacher of the first class. And you, young gentlemen, will take an affectionate leave of your classmate, for you will never see him again." They never did see him in that classroom again, but the day came when the eyes of the nation beheld him.

NOTES.

In Persia, where the government has a monopoly of tobacco, the chief authorities at Kuhela proclaimed an edict against smoking, and ordered the people to break their pipes.

The wine crop of California last year amounted to one quart for every man, woman and child in the United States. The total abstinence of some, however, will enable others to swell their quota to a barrel.

Last year was a most extraordinary one for agricultural products. Both the wheat and the tobacco crops were the greatest ever known in this country. The cotton crop was equal to the greatest and best. The corn crop was the second best, and the fruit and vegetable crops were never better.

A Tammany sagem a few days ago, in discussing politics and the relative standing of leading presidential candidates, gave expression to this characteristic Tammany sentiment: "The gang can't afford to tie to a dead horse." Mr. Cleveland certainly cannot appreciate this "classic" idea.

Perhaps everyone does not know how easily fresh apple blossoms can be had in winter. Get the ends of branches with plump flower buds and place them in water in a warm, sunny window and they will soon bloom. No doubt many other kinds of trees and shrubs will give as good satisfaction.

Parlor cars now transport tourists from Jaffa to Jerusalem, shrieking steamboats ply the sea of Galilee and regattas are held on the river Jordan. It is no longer the "Wild Judea" of the Scripture, or the mystic land to which the Crusaders turned their faces. Palestine is rapidly losing its poetic glamor.

The National Editorial Association has determined to visit California next May. This is a great representative body, and will be of incalculable benefit to this coast. The country press is fully represented in this body, and our people and this state will be published among those from whom benefits may come to this coast. Our people should at once take steps to entertain this association when they arrive.

The emperor of China is said to rest in serene security, confident that his enemies can never prevail over him by force of arms. He has hired an able magician, who promises to put a mystic "kibosh" on the firearms of the imperial adversaries so that they cannot be used. European powers having any idea of coercing the emperor from and after this date would better consider this matter before beginning hostilities.

It may be a matter of interest to the public to know that of all the principal agricultural products grown in the United States (including corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, tobacco, hay, rice, cotton, sugar, potatoes and hops) the proportionate increase in quantity and value for the last forty years is far greater for barley and hops, the two products used in the manufacture of malt liquors, than for any of the others.

Small things, in the hands of Providence, often deprive men of life in this world. Pope Adrian lost his life by the sting of a gnat. A distinguished Rouish counselor lost his life by a hair, which was in some milk that he drank. The emperor of France, Charles V., was deprived of his life by eating a mushroom. Anacreon, the famous Greek poet, who lived in the sixth century before Christ, was choked by a grape seed, in the act of drinking wine, at the age of eighty-five years.

Cyrus Truman Wheeler.

Death has claimed Cyrus Wheeler. He died on the 17th instant. It is unnecessary his life-course should be more than generally reviewed; he leaves no enemies; his friends—many, indeed—will reverence his memory. It has fallen to the lot of but few that, when the ending came, the ledger-balancing showed a pronounced credit. Cyrus Wheeler left the world in debt to him. It would have been unseemly had reference been made to his charitable acts while he was in life; to him it would have been distasteful. That he has passed away, the veil may with propriety be lifted. An unknown hand did aid the distressed at Christmas time; some one did seek out the needy, and did relieve them; many there are in this community who felt the benefit, yet never knew from whom it came. Let it now be understood our fallen brother was the Samaritan. Mr. Wheeler was a native of New York, but spent the greater part of his life in Sacramento. From the very early days he was connected with the house of Booth & Co.; practically was the director. A useful citizen; his loss is severe to this people.

Pioneer Reminiscences.

The following article appeared in Our Paper of Concord Junction, Mass., on January 9th. It will interest some of our "old-timers":

On the 18th of January the "bear flag" will be hoisted over the Revere House to notify California Pioneers and others that it is the anniversary of the discovery of gold in California, and that the New England Associated California Pioneers of '49 will hold their annual business meeting and banquet in commemoration of that event. There they will meet comrades who have shared with them all the trials, dangers and fun of a miner's life during the pioneer days. They have slept in the same blankets, sometimes in a cloth tent or log cabin, and often with nothing except the blankets to protect them from the elements. They will meet their "old pards" who have toiled dirt, rocked the cradle, used the pick and shovel, forked down the long tom and sluice, cooked beans and flapjacks, washed the dishes, cut the wood and did other chores, "turn and turn about." Comrades will there meet their rivals at the fandangoes of the mining camps of '49, and those who have side by side "stood in" with each other against claim jumpers, ballot-box stuffers, Sydney thieves, shoulder-strikers, and other enemies of fair dealing and good government. They will again tramp with their blankets, frying-pan, coffee-pot, double-barreled shotgun and Allen's pepper-boxes, over the trail to Hornitas, Woods Creek, Spanish Dry Diggins, Hawkin's Bar, Long Bar, Beal's Bar, Horse-shoe Bar and other rich mines; and—Ynbadam.

When the bear flag is displayed at the top of the staff, forty-miners from all over New England rally to meet old chums who knew no other banner to rally around in pioneer days. Forty-miners honor the bear flag without conflicting in any way with their love, devotion and loyalty to the stars and stripes.

At the ballot-box in 1850, the pioneers made it possible for California to be admitted into the union, as a free state, and the pioneers from New England largely contributed to the defeat of the schemes of slave-holders who flocked to the Pacific hoping to add another to the list of slave states. Those were times that tried men's nerves and courage, their loyalty and the comradeship which has never been severed. The New England pioneers were true to their early education and instincts, and they had the courage of their convictions. Californians consider it a high honor to be a forty miner. To the pioneers of '49 and the Grand Army of the Republic is due the credit and honor of making and of saving California a free state in the union. The pioneers defeated the slave-holders at the ballot-box in 1850, and the volunteer soldiers of '61-'66 vanquished the rebels in the field. When the "emblem of treason" was carried defiantly on the streets, and insolently flaunted in the public halls of the capitol of the state, there was no strong loyal organization; but a few firemen under the leadership of a New England pioneer, who has always since that time made Sacramento his home, charged the secession standard-bearer and captured the flag, and soon after the out and out rebels left Sacramento for a more congenial clime.

The boys of '49 offer no apology for gray hairs or lost teeth; they will meet as comrades and shipmates who have fought the Indians and the elements side by side; divided the last flapjack and dollar, and "drank from the same canteen." The forty-miners meet for a sociable good time, only when their banner floats from the top of the staff, for when the old grizzly bear stops at half-mast and there remains hugging the pole, all know that another forty-miner is gone on the trail that leads to St. Peter's gate, and serious thoughts of who will be the next to go quiet their mirth, to be renewed when the bear climbs again to the top of the pole. W. W. Story says:

"E'en as I listen down Time's narrowing cone,
The voices cheer me that from earth have gone.
From the far east their earliest voice I hear,
Vague, faint, and distant, muttering to my ear;
Still to the west they call, and evermore
Their tone comes purer, clearer than before."

J. A. G.

"People about to marry" who wish to know the proper ages are referred to following precedents: Shakspeare, 18; Ben Johnson, 21; Franklin, 24; Mozart, 25; Dante, Kepler, Fuller, Johnson, Burke and Scott, 26; Tycho Brahe, Byron, Washington and Bonaparte, 27; Penn and Sterne, 28; Linneus and Nelson, 29; Burns, 30; Chaucer, Hogarth and Peel, 32; Wordsworth and Davy, 33; Aristotle, 36; Sir William Jones and Wellington, 37; Wilberforce, 38; Luther, 42; Addison, 44; Wesley and Young, 47; Swift, 48; Buffon, 55; Old Parr, last time, 120. Adam and Eve married before they were a year old, and the veteran Parr buckled with a widow at 120.

I wonder why it is we are not all kinder than we are! How much the world needs it! How easily it is done! How infallibly it is remembered! How superabundantly it pays itself back! For there is no debtor in the world so honorable, so superbly honorable, as love. "Love never faileth."—Prof. Drummond.

Caricatures of Washington.

General Washington was inaugurated president at New York in 1789. How often has the world been assured that no dissident voice was heard on that occasion! The arrival of the general in New York was a pageant which the entire population is supposed to have most heartily approved; and a very pleasant spectacle it must have been, as seen from the end of the island—the vessels decked with flags and streamers, and the president's stately barge, rowed by thirteen pilots in white uniforms, advancing toward the city, surrounded and followed by an immense cloud of small boats, to the thunder of great guns. But even then, it seems, there were a few who looked askance. At least one caricature appeared. "All the world here," wrote John Armstrong to the unreconciled General Gates, "are busy collecting flowers and sweets of every kind to amuse and delight the president. People were asking one another," he adds, "by what awe-inspiring title the president should be called, even plain Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, regarding 'His Excellency' as beneath the grandeur of the office. Yet," says Armstrong, "in the midst of this admiration there are skeptics who doubt its propriety, and many wits who amuse themselves at its extravagance. The first will grumble and the last will laugh, and the president should be prepared to meet the attacks of both with firmness and good nature. A caricature has already appeared, called 'The Entry,' full of very disloyal and profane allusions." It was by no means a good natured picture. General Washington was represented riding upon an ass, and held in the arms of his favorite man, Billy, once huntsman, then valet and factotum; Colonel David Humphreys, the general's aid and secretary, led the ass, singing hosannas and birthday odes, one couplet of which was legible:

"The glorious time has come to pass
When David shall conduct an ass."

This effort was more ill-natured than brilliant; but the reader who examines the fugitive publications of that period will often feel that the adulation of the president was such as to provoke and justify severe caricature. That adulation was as excessive as it was ill executed; and part of the office of caricature is to remind Philip that he is a man. The numberless "verses," "odes," "tributes," "stanza's," "lines" and "sonnets" addressed to President Washington lie entombed in the dingy leaves of the old newspapers, but a few of the epigrams which they provoked have been disinterred, and even some of the caricatures are described in the letters of the time. Neither the verses nor the pictures are at all remarkable. Probably the best caricature that appeared during the administration of General Washington was suggested by the removal of the national capital from New York to Philadelphia. Senator Robert Morris, being a Philadelphian, and having large possessions in Philadelphia, was popularly supposed to have procured the passage of the measure, and accordingly the portly senator is seen in the picture carrying off upon his broad shoulders the federal hall, the windows of which are crowded with members of both houses, some commending, others cursing, this novel method of removal. In the distance is seen the old Paulus Hook ferry-house, at what is now Jersey City, on the roof of which is the devil beckoning to the heavy-laden Morris, and crying to him: "This way, Bobby." The removal of the capital was a fruitless theme for the humorists of the day. Even then "New York Politicians" had an ill name, and congress was deemed well out of their reach.

Heirs to European Thrones.

It is rather an interesting occupation to note how few of the thrones of Europe are destined to descend in a direct line. Russia and Italy rejoice, it is true, in direct heirs, but the future emperor of Austria is the brother of the present sovereign, and so, too, is the next king of the Belgians and the future king of Saxony as well. In Bavaria the crown will pass from the mad King Otto either to the present regent, his uncle, or to that regent's oldest son, Prince Louis. The little king of Spain has a charming heiress in the person of his eldest sister, the Princess Mercedes. Should the little queen of Holland die unmarried or childless, her crown will pass to her aunt, the Princess Sophia, who is quite an old lady, being 68, or to the eldest son of that princess, the Grand Duke Charles Augustus of Saxe Weimar Eisenbach, whose eldest son, Prince William Ernest, has already been mentioned as a possible candidate for the hand of the little queen.

Searching the history of China for evidences of a stone age, Joseph Edkins finds that as far back as B. C. 2205, in the time of Yu, all the common metals are mentioned, in a list of tribute offered the emperor. Fifty years before, the emperor Shun had buried gold to make the people more covetous. A stone hatchet has lately been found near Kalgau in a mound forty feet high. The mound and others in its neighborhood are said to resemble those of Ohio, and the hatchet is not to be distinguished from those of "mound builders" in Ohio's museum.

Swamp Fox Marion and His Men.

It is said that Marion often encamped at The Oaks, near Charleston, South Carolina, the owners, the Middletons, having been from the first devoted patriots. And this brings up again Marion and Marion's men, a little band who probably never dreamed that they were to go down on the page of history embalmed in poetry and romance and song, figures strong in local South Carolina coloring, and yet known all over the country almost as widely as George Washington himself. General Francis Marion, who, as the angry and harassed British officer complained, "would not fight like a Christian and a gentleman," belonged to the Huguenot colony of the Santee, north of Charleston, the same Santee that owned those high hills. On the formation of the revolutionary army of Carolina, Marion was made a captain in the regiment commanded by Moultrie; he rose to a colonelcy before the evacuation of Charleston, and, escaping the fate of prisoners of war which fell to Moultrie and many other officers, he collected the fragments of his regiment together in the recesses of the swamps, and from that moment became a dread to the whole British army in the south. Marion made war in his own way; now here, now there; now seen, now gone; he was like a meteor in the night, and the successes gained by his extraordinary swiftness and daring seemed marvelous alike to friend and to foe. He selected young men for his band, generally from his own neighbors of French descent; he lived in the swamps; he swam rivers on horseback; his favorite encampment was a cane-brake. He did not wait for all his troops, but sallied out frequently with only ten or twelve; he took saws from the mills, and turned them into swords; he frequently engaged when he had but three rounds to a man. Scouts were kept out constantly, and when word was brought in of a small party of the enemy anywhere, then forth went Marion's men after them. It is said that he was so secret in his plans that his own soldiers had no idea when they were to be called out, and that their only way of knowing was to watch the negro cook. When the old man was seen cooking a little store of poor food, which was their only fare, then they prepared for departure. Marion's favorite time for starting was at sunset, and then the march lasted all night. Marion's men—brave, shoeless, ragged, blanketless, gallant little band—the following is a verse of one of the many songs that were made about you:

"Our band is few, but true and tried,
Our leader swift and bold;
The British soldier trembles
When Marion's name is told.
Our fortress is the good greenwood,
Our tent the cypress tree;
We know the forest round us
As scamen know the sea;
We know its walls of thorny vines,
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark morass."—[BRYANT.]

It is said that Cornwallis had an especial fear of Marion, and never sat down in any strange house in the neighborhood of Charleston, but always on a piazza or under a tree, that with his own eyes he could watch for the swift-darting foe. Poor Cornwallis! what joy swept over the country when he was taken! Even the Dutch watchmen of Philadelphia called the news after midnight, "Bast twelve o'clock, and Cornwallis es dagen!"

Rothschild's Maxims.

These are the maxims which Baron Rothschild, reputed to be the richest man in Europe, wrote when a boy, and to the observance of which he attributes much of his success in life. It is not certain that every boy can do likewise, but it will do no harm for every boy to try.

Attend carefully to the details of your business.
Be prompt in all things.
Consider well and then decide positively.
Dare to do right; fear to do wrong.
Endure trials patiently.
Fight life's battle bravely, manfully.
Go not into the society of the vicious.
Hold integrity sacred.
Injure not another's reputation or business.
Join hands only with the virtuous.
Keep your mind from evil thoughts.
Lie not for any consideration.
Make few acquaintances.
Never try to appear what you are not.
Observe good manners.
Pay your debts promptly.
Question not the veracity of a friend.
Respect the counsel of your parent.
Sacrifice money rather than principle.
Touch not, taste not, handle not, intoxicate drinks.
Use your leisure time for improvement.
Venture not upon the threshold of a wrong.
Watch carefully over your passions.
Extend to everyone a kindly salutation.
Yield not to discouragement.
Zealously labor for right.
And success is certain.

When Sydney Smith compared matrimony to a pair of shears, he divided the latter evenly between the man and the wife. Since that time, however, things have so changed that the woman has come to be regarded as the shears and the man as the shorn.

Friendship Council's Entertainment.

The literary and musical entertainment and dance given by Friendship Council, No. 65, O. C. F., in their fine new hall on Tenth street, on Thursday evening last, proved highly enjoyable to the large crowd in attendance, and was a most complete success in every particular. The following programme was excellently rendered, the participants all receiving hearty encores: Overture, orchestra; piano solo, Miss Maggie Young; vocal solo (in costume), Clarence M. Love; vocal duet, Miss Jessie Clark and Miss Susie Dodson; recitation, little Anna Laughlin; violin solo, Prof. Carl Vandal; recitation, Miss Kitty McCarty; instrumental duet (guitar and mandolin), Venezuela brothers. Prof. Neale's orchestra furnished superb music, and both old and young whirled through the giddy mazes of the dance until the hour of twelve bade them desist. Friendship council contemplates giving a series of these social entertainments, and, judging from the success of the one on Thursday evening, they will prove drawing cards to the public.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

It is in the teacup that the girl of the period reads a tale of joy or woe. It is rather mystifying to see a lot of women balancing their spoons on the edge of their cups, first having made sure that they are perfectly dry, and then, with another spoon, partially filled and held above the first, watch them count the drops as they fall from the one above into the bowl of the other. Each drop stands for a year, and show how many years will pass before each young woman may expect to be married. The witchcraft of the whole thing lies in the fact that even the girl who is careful only to take a little liquid in the second spoon may have as many drops as she who dips liberally and as if she didn't care. Silence reigns supreme while these fate readings are absorbing attention, and it is astonishing to mark how profound the silence is in place of the usual chatter. When some one begins to stir her tea quite rapidly, a little to one side, you may safely guess that she has found a "beau" and is trying to see if he is attracted to the spoon; if so, she may expect a call very soon, perhaps that very night. Tea thus becomes a momentous sign of fate.

Japan is made up of a chain of volcanic mountains, and the arable land of the empire is officially put at 11,215,000 acres—less than one-half the area of the state of New York—and this is so fertile and thoroughly cultivated that it feeds a population of 37,000,000—about that of France. Rice is one of the principal crops, and of this some 200,000,000 bushels are raised annually. Hand labor is generally used, and two or three crops a year are raised on the same land. Artificial irrigation is general, being necessary over half of the cultivated land, and frequently the water is taken from streams twenty to thirty miles distant. The total number of horned cattle is 1,115,000, and of horses 1,605,000. Wool of all kinds is cheap and abundant.

Glass drinking-cups have been found in Anglo Saxon graves, and they are all round-bottomed. Such cups could not be made to stand upright, and it is supposed they were so designed in order to cause the drinker to empty them at once. This feature is said to have given rise to the word "tumbler" which has been applied to our drinking vessels, though these do not possess the curious shape of the ancient cups.

Apologizing—a very desperate habit—one that is rarely cured. Apology is only egotism wrong side out. Nine times out of ten the first thing a man's companion knows of his shortcomings is from his apology.—Holmes.

It is the nature of parties to retain their original enmities far more firmly than their original principles. But when parties arrive at this stage it is a sure sign that the dry rot has set in. Their day of usefulness is over.—Macaulay.

It always grieves me to contemplate the initiation of children into the ways of life when they are scarcely more than infants. It checks their confidence and simplicity, two of the best qualities that Heaven gives them, and demands that they share our sorrow before they are capable of entering into our enjoyments.—Dickens.

God lades the wings of private prayer with the sweetest, choicest and chiefest blessings. Ah! how often hath God kissed the poor christian at the beginning of private prayer, and filled him with light, joy and assurance upon its close! As is the fresh air to a close, infected room, so is the keen, invigorating breeze from the throne of God, which peers into the narrow chamber of the heart, stuffed with the prejudices and passions and fancies of our own little circle, of our own little thoughts, whose doors have never been opened to new ideas or bright feelings, whose windows have been closed against all wider and higher views.—Dean Stanley.

Oh, did we but know when we were happy! Could the restless, feverish, ambitious heart be still, but for a moment still, and yield itself, without one farther-aspiring throb, to its enjoyment—then were I happy; yes, thrice happy! But no; this fluttering, struggling and imprisoned spirit beats the bars of its golden cage, disdains the silken fetter; it will not close its eyes and fold its wings; as if time were not swift enough, its swifter thoughts outstrip its rapid flight, and onward, onward do they wing their way to the distant mountains, to the fleeting clouds of the future; and yet I know that ere long, weary and wayworn and disappointed, they shall return to nestle in the bosom of the past.—Longfellow.

How Monkeys are Captured.

How are monkeys caught? The ape family resembles man. Their vices are human. They love liquor, and fall. In Darfour and Senor the natives make a fermented beer, of which the monkeys are passionately fond. Aware of this, the natives go to the parts of the forest frequented by the monkeys and set on the ground calabashes full of the enticing liquor. As soon as the monkey sees and tastes it, he utters loud cries of joy, that soon attract his comrades. Then an orgie begins, and then in a short time they show all degrees of intoxication. Then the negroes appear. The few who came too late to get fuddled escape. The drinkers are too far gone to distrust the negroes, but apparently take them for larger species of their own genus. The negroes take some up, and these begin to weep and cover them with mandarin kisses. When a negro takes one by the hand to lead him off, the nearest monkey will cling to the one who thus finds a support, and endeavor to go on also. Another will grasp at him, and so on until the negro leads a staggering line of ten or a dozen tipsy monkeys. When finally brought to the village, they are securely caged and gradually sobered down; but for two or three days a gradually diminishing supply of liquor is given them, so as to reconcile them by degrees to their state of captivity.

Pottery was discovered, Grant Allen suggests, by accident. A savage carried some water in a calabash—the hard shell of a tropical fruit—when it occurred to him to smear the outside with clay and put the calabash itself over the fire. This he did, the water boiled, and upon removing the calabash he found it encased and protected by a hard, red, stone-like substance.

When a little boy sits down to the table he wants to eat pie first. And that trait follows him through life. None of us like to wait until the last for the good things of life. We want the dessert first. Everybody seems to be looking for a pudding.

The best leeches come from the pine districts of New Jersey, but the most of them come from Sweden and Norway. They are imported into this country by a firm whose office is in Maiden Lane, New York, who collect orders from their customers and make but one general importation, receiving fully 2,000,000 leeches per year. The average price is about $8 per thousand, and the cost, price and freight, is about $2. The profit is simply enormous.

Miss Mabel.

"Bless my soul! Miss Mabel must be going to have company. Two white papers and three brown ones! Tea and cake must be in the white papers," said Granny Page, flattening her nose on the window frame and gazing across the street as a little figure tripped up the opposite dwelling. "But come, 'Becca, be sly and hev yer eyes open."

"It's just like Miss Mabel to keep so close," said Granny Page, as the flaxen-haired Abigail resumed her knitting, "not that I'm of the curious kind, as always likes to pry into their neighbors' affairs; but I'd be almost willin' to wager my silver snuff box that it's Deacon Green as is bobbin' round; and all I hev to say is that Miss Mabel might do worse than get the deacon—the ten little Greens slapped in in the bargain. But, bless my heart, there goes Mrs. Grimly, Miss Mabel's only sister. How strange it was I didn't happen to think of her. I knew Sally Grimly and her sister Mabel—for ne'er a one is as young as she once was—when they hadn't the second stitch to their backs, and they did hev their disappointments."

"Why, grandma, what were they?" asked a young girl who had hitherto remained silent.

"So you've woke up, hev you, Millie?" asked the old lady, "and expected to hear a love story. Well, for once you shall hear one."

"Sally and Mabel Miller lived within a stone's throw of our house. Their father, Jacob Miller, was as poor as a church mouse, yet Mrs. Miller wanted her daughters to be more than common folks."

"They were lively girls, full of fun, and as ready for a frolic as any of us. Mabel, particularly was a great favorite, and every one in the village had made up their mind that she and Charlie Long—Farmer Long's youngest son—would make a match of it, when all on a sudden Mrs. Miller giv out that her darters war goin' to York, and sure enough, they went."

"Of course, Charlie Long giv up all thought of Mabel, for you see he was not to be mentioned with the city chaps; an' the day was fixed for a grand weddin', which was to take place in the city at Mrs. Miller's sister's, where the girls had been stayin'."

"I shall never forget the day," continued Granny Page, "when Mattie Miller drov off to see her darters married. She looked as proud as a peacock, an' the whole village was talkin' of how she'd worried Jacob into mor'gagin' thar bit of a place to giv' the gals a regular outfit. Judge, then, if we warn't amazed when the next day she returned with both of the gals, and when we ventured in to see her new son-in-law she told us we needn't be in a hurry, for her gals had changed thar minds."

"Now I ain't curious, but I hadn't seen my sister Debby, as lives in York, nigh on ten years, and I jest told yer grand'ther I'd a notion to pay Debby a visit, an' sure enough, off I started."

"We war takin' our cup o' tea together, Debby and I, when it popped in my mind to ax her if she know'd Mattie Miller's sister."

"I reckon I do, Betsy," ses she.

"Then yer ve heard o' Mattie's darters," ses I. "They've been stayin' with their aunt this winter."

"Pity they hadn't stayed in home," said Debby.

"What do you mean?" said I.

"Why, bless yer heart, Betsy, didn't yer kno' the gals war all trigged out to get married, the parson waitin', an' ev'ry blessed soul expectin' to 'gratulate 'em, when all on a sudden up steps two p'lice and clapped thar hands on the britegrooms, and, ses they, 'ver my prisoners.' Of course, thar war a great time. Mabel fainted clean away, and Sally made at the p'lice like a wildcat."

"Well, Millie," continued Granny Page, "I wasn't much surprised, for that jest come o' Mattie Miller's thinkin' her darters above their betters. But I hev'n't told you all yet, child."

"The youngest 'un, Miss Mabel, tuk it right to heart, an' settled down to readin' good books, an' goin' to meetin'; the other 'un didn't seem to mind it a bit arter a spell, and somehow or other she managed to get on the soft side of Peter Grimly."

"Sally Grimly has set up her carriage, and goes down to Saratoga, etc. Once in a while she comes down to see her sister, Miss Mabel. But here comes the Widow Larkson. Set a chair for her, Millie."

"I jest dropped in, Betsy," said the newcomer, "to see if you were axed to the weddin'."

"What weddin'? What on 'arth do you mean, neighbor?"

"Why, Deacon Green and Miss Mabel."

"Deacon Green and Miss Mabel? Well, I ain't a curious woman, neighbor Larkson, but to think that after all they should step off and me not know it."

There are 169 confederate battle flags in the collection of war relics at Washington. Of these, twenty-eight separate regimental colors were captured after Pickett's charge at Gettysburg.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." SAMPLE BOTTLE mailed free to any lady on receipt of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

A Delicate Poem.

We knew it would rain, for all the morn
A spirit on slender robes of mist
Was lowering its golden buckets down
Into the vapory amethyst
Of marshes and swamps and dismal fens,
Scooping the dew that lay in the flowers,
Dipping the jewels out of the sea,
To sprinkle them over the land in showers.
We knew it would rain, for the poplars showed
The white of their leaves, the amber grain
Shrunk in the wind, and the lightning now
Is tangled in the tremulous skeins of rain.
—T. B. Aldrich.

Time.

Fly, envious time, till thou run out thy race,
Call on the lazy leaden-stepping hours,
Whose speed is but the heavy plummet's pace,
And glut thyself with what thy womb devours,
Which is no more than what is false and vain,
And merely mortal dross;
So little is our loss,
So little is thy gain.—Milton.

He Got Even.

A young couple who had been keeping company two years, became engaged, with the consent of all concerned, and looked forward with the customary supreme bliss to the consummation of their betrothal. Suddenly the betrothed maiden changed her mind and told her lover she would not marry him. When he recovered his breath he begged for an explanation, but could get no other than that she had decided to marry somebody else. Sorrowfully he left her, and in the solitude of his chamber put on his thinking cap. The result was that the jilt received a formal note from him telling her that he would call on a certain evening for a final answer. He called and met with a frigid reception. His affianced told him that her decision was irrevocable, and handed him a package containing all his gifts to her. "By Jove!" he cried, "you're the best girl in the universe! I feel as though a ton might have been lifted from my breast." He grabbed the package and his hat and made for the door. The girl was petrified with amazement. "What is the meaning of this?" she stammered. "Why, it means," he answered, "that I am free. I tried my best to muster up courage enough to ask you to release me, but couldn't do it. I'll send you your letters and everything but the ring. That, I am afraid, Cora will not give up."

"And pray, who may Cora be?" was snapped out rather viciously.

"Oh, she's the girl I'm going now to ask to marry me. She's a beauty. I'll send you her picture and I'll give her the diamond earrings you have returned to me." His hand was on the knob when these words arrested him:

"If you attempt to go I'll scream. I want you to understand that our engagement holds good. Don't go near that Cora again. I am going to marry you myself."

The nuptials will be celebrated at the time originally set.

Man and Woman's Headache.

"Bab" gives the following description of the headache: It's funny the different ways men and women have headaches. A woman has a headache, and she walks around the house with her head wrapped up in a handkerchief dipped in bay rum, and she scolds the servants, administers punishment to the child that doesn't need it, and wonders what in the world she ever got married for, and wishes she were dead, and then has a cup of tea about every three quarters of an hour. She says she is letting it "wear off," but it's the family who endure the wearing process, and until a headache has become nothing but a memory the entire establishment endures it.

When a man gets a headache he comes home and announces that he is going to die; and then he goes to bed, has the doctor sent for, takes whatever he gives him, groans and makes a great time generally, gets the sympathy of the entire household, and day after to-morrow is quite well and ready to go down town and tell how near he came to dying, what a close call he had, and how only the skill of the doctor and the nursing of his wife saved him. Now, the man's way is decidedly the best. He gets rid of the cause of the headache, and, as the entire household has been moaning, "Poor papa!" he has their sympathy. The woman just lets the headache go away, irritates and upsets everybody, and it is certain it will come back another day. Why are the women such geese? Why, when they feel ill, don't they just have it out by going to bed and making the best of it? It is a much more sensible way and much more satisfactory. Headaches are absolutely the skeletons in some houses, because they bring so much terror with them.

"If you think you're going to have the grip, Maria," observed Mr. Billus, peevishly, "of course you'll have it. Any doctor will tell you that a constant dread of any disease is likely to make you catch it." "Not always, John," replied Mrs. Billus. "You might live for sixty years in constant dread of a brain disease and you'd never get it, John."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The Wasp of San Francisco recently published two articles relative to the history of the late Sacramento Union and regarding its proprietors and writers. The history of that paper and of the men who controlled it will ever be of interest in this state. The Union existed here from March, 1851, until February, 1875. No paper was more independent. It knew but one purpose, and had but one motive—to do right. What it, in the light of a large experience and an unfettered judgment, understood to be the highest interests of the people, without regard to what the people themselves thought at the time, was the pole star which ever directed its course. A boundless faith in the trained judgment and implacable honesty of its conductors made the paper authority with the people upon all public questions, such as has been rarely witnessed. It commanded public confidence to the end, and fought its battles to the last ditch with unquenchable energy and spirit.

It was the instrument that brought about, in large measure, the establishment of the Pacific railroad; created the very power which destroyed it. During the civil war the pen of its editorial writer, Mr. Watson, and the eloquence of Thomas Starr King and Henry Edgerton—lamented dead—wrote and voiced the sentiment of the loyal people of California, and gave assurance to the president that this far-off state would sustain whatever measures he should adopt to crush the rebellion. In matters political the paper made governors and congressional representatives; indeed, swayed the political balance.

Yet it was, time did come when selfish interests demanded its destruction. Its proprietors refused a bribe to betray the people, and war was declared against it. From 1867 to 1875 it battled against heavy odds. It was not until about 1871, however, that its enemy embarked in expensive journalism; then a paper similar in typography to the Union was established and given all the advantages which coin could afford. So petty a measure, indeed, was resorted to that the sale of the Union upon the railway cars and in the depot was prohibited. The fight lasted until February 20, 1875, when the Union struck its colors—no, it did not strike its colors; it went down with them flying at the masthead.

We are amused at the expressions of some that are quoted in the Wasp that the destruction of this paper was due to business competition. In a degraded sense of the word it might be termed "business," but the business lacked the element of legitimacy. The writer had been connected with the Union during several years of this war, and until the moment its last issue left the printing press; was in a position to know from association in the editorial-room the cause which brought about the determination of its proprietors to surrender their journal. The effort to crush it by the publication of a rival paper had proved ineffectual; that it did not command the confidence of the people; its maintenance had been extremely expensive, and its owners were in a position to realize the situation Satan was in at one time, when, as it is related, he compacted with a man he would furnish unlimited capital if at the ending of a certain year the man would agree to go to hell and acknowledge to those below he came there of his free will. Things went on well with the man for much time, and while indulging in all sorts of extravagance, the devil graciously yielded the coin. As the time for accounting approached, the man concluded this world was good enough for him, and he conceived a winning idea: he started a newspaper; the devil saw the point, he knew it would break him, and released the compact.

In this case the ending was brought about through one of these public meetings of "prominent citizens," for which Sacramento is so ridiculously noted. A municipal election was about to transpire, and at an opportune time a "prominent citizen" was privileged to make public here an intimation that, if our people would behave themselves, there would be erected in the city a rolling-mill. A man unspectacled, and even at a distance, can readily see the effect such an intimation would have on the "prominent citizens" of Sacramento. A public meeting was called by "a committee of citizens," and it met in Turner Hall on the night of February 9th, 1875. At that meeting the spokesman announced that a conference had been had with the railroad directors, and that assurance had been given them that there was a prospect of changing the feeling of the people of Sacramento, and that Governor Stanford "very promptly replied that, if the people of Sacramento were willing to bury the hatchet, to forget old scores and bring about a better feeling, the railway directors were willing to meet them half way;" and the present of rolling-mills was promised. Then followed the usual speeches of the numerous advantages that would flow from their establishment. That the mischief has been done, its seriousness has in measure passed, and view can be taken of it in degree in the light of ridicule. For instance, Judge H. O. Beatty, in an enthusiastic speech, said: "If these workshops are established here, they will bring to this city no less than three thousand or four thousand workmen in the end. We will not have that many immediately, but it will not be years before that number will be here; and with those dependent on these workmen, it will come near doubling our population within five years." Then followed in the meeting the adoption of a preamble and ten resolutions, that, perhaps, are the most subservient ever adopted by any body of men. They are, however, of advantage. They should be framed side by side with the declarations of protest that were made by our forefathers against the exactions of the British government. Profitable it will be for the children of to-day, and of days to come, to compare the papers. So pitiable a bauble as a promise that was never intended to be fulfilled brought about the abject surrender, apparently, of the people of a great city, and the destruction of the best friend they ever had—a fearless and independent newspaper. Perhaps we can excuse the enthusiasm of Judge Beatty, that he had in mind the wiping out of the city debt within five years; but, unfortunately, the three thousand or four thousand men and their contingent have not so far loomed up.

There were two meetings held in Sacramento city that night, and the writer attended both. He had been directed by his employers to take down in shorthand the proceedings had at Turner Hall. Subsequently, in the editorial-room of the Union he found assembled the proprietors and editors of the paper, with a few of their friends, and to them there was read that which had been said. The picture will never fade while life remains with those who were present. Morrill and Anthony uttered not a word: realized it was a doom—an edict of destruction from men they had befriended—ingratitude. Seabough paced the room with that manifestation of defiance that was his characteristic. He alone did speak and interrupt the reading at times by expressions concerning the men who had part in the meeting of humility. Ten days later the last issue of the paper was put forth. Then it was Seabough wrote, among other things:

The construction of railways to San Francisco, followed by the publication of cheap papers, maintained by the monthly subsidy of rich men and a corporation that could afford to place one dollar out of every thousand it had stolen or expected to steal from the state and the municipalities, had doubtless some influence in curtailing the circulation and business of the Union; but by no means as much as is claimed by the enemy. The establishment and maintenance of an opposition paper here by the Central Pacific Railroad Company was more a blunder on their part than an injury to the Union. It was never in our way to the extent of $50 a month, until that part of the citizens of Sacramento, who are proud to be the slaves and menials of the man who scorns them as Coriolanus did the plebian rabble, organized their kennel with the avowed purpose of destroying the oldest and most faithful friend of the city. After this the proprietors of the Union felt that, having neither pleasure nor profit in further continuing the fight for the people here, it was best to end it; and they appeal to the candid judgment of the people to say whether they are right or wrong in this course. As long as the struggle touched their pockets only, the sacrifices it entailed were borne cheerfully; but when it also assailed their pride, further endurance was impossible; the more especially as the treacherous and dastard blow came from the hands of old neighbors who had for half a lifetime shared to the full in the benefits of having such a paper published in the city. There is, perhaps, no parallel to this in the history of journalism, that a first class paper has been able, upon its own merits and unaided by subsidy from any quarter, to maintain itself in a sixth or eighth-class town, for nearly 25 years. There is also no other instance known to us, where a single journal, by appeals to the reason and judgment of mankind, has been able, like the Union, to defeat the worst schemes of a corporation as powerful as the Central Pacific, and to baffle all its efforts at destruction for seven years of constant and most bitter warfare. But for the fidelity of this paper to its high trust and its vigor in exposing the designs of the enemy, the state and counties of California would now be in debt to Leland Stanford and his company in the sum of not less than twenty millions of dollars. The loss of this coveted and eagerly hunted prize is the main cause of the hatred which that corporation bears to the Union. And this remark leads to the reflection that so great a service as the Union has rendered in this single respect was worthy of a better recognition than it received; a remark which, if we are not mistaken, will meet the concurrence of many as they grow in a knowledge of the far-off plans of the enemy, and look in vain for a journal as capable and as honorable as this one has been in the protection of the people against them.

It may be incidentally remarked the destruction of the Union was in part brought about by a boycott. That was understood in the office. Public opinion did not then sustain the action of the men who assumed to voice the sentiments of this community; nor has it since. A little more of recorded history and we will close. In the course of a speech delivered in this city on the night of July 23d, 1875, Senator Booth said:

It is constantly asserted that the railroad holds the prosperity of this city in the hollow of its hand, and we are given to understand that the conduct and policy of the company toward the city will depend—not upon public interests, nor even the interests of the company, but upon the subservience of the city to their wishes. Let us see how the city has dealt with the railroad. She has given without charge the use of the levee for a road-bed, all her interest in the land in the slough, the land along Front street where the depots are, and almost the whole of the water front which has any practical value, so much that no rival steamer can run upon the river in competition with those of the company. What else is there that the city might, could, would, should or can give? What else do they want? Here is a community that has done more than any and every other to build up this company, yet every election that has been held here since they grew powerful, has been under a threat of their displeasure and vengeance. These threats have been not only open and wholesale, but private and retail. Men have been told personally over and over again, that unless they voted a railroad ticket, they would be injured in their business; and all who had the temerity to advertise in the Sacramento Union were first "warned" by the company, then placed on the black list for proscription. [Applause.]

In 1872 an election was held here, and we were warned as before, that, unless the city went their way, the offices of the company would be removed. The city did go their way by a small majority, and forthwith the offices were removed to San Francisco, which gave an average of 2,000 against them at the same election. Possibly, they might not have been removed, only the building designed for them had been commenced long before the specific threat was made, and was ready for occupancy. A decree had been registered by the railroad company that the Sacramento Union should be destroyed. It was the ablest newspaper ever published in a community of this size. [Applause.] Its service in the cause of right and truth had been of inestimable value. It had never bowed to power or truckled to position or soiled its integrity. [Applause, and three cheers for the Sacramento Union.] Being dead, it yet lives, and its spirit walks abroad. [Applause.] But it had refused to share with the railroad in a legislative scheme of plunder, and had stood boldly up in defense of the people and their rights, against all schemes, open or insidious. It was destroyed, at their bidding, in the house of its friends. There has been no other such exhibition of the brute power of money to crush free speech, in American history. [Applause, and three cheers for the Sacramento Union.] You have exchanged the Sacramento Union for the promise of a "rolling-mill!" [laughter] a promise that will be renewed as often as you are asked to sacrifice your manhood to the will of those who aspire to be your august masters—and fulfilled when it suits their sovereign pleasure, convenience and interest; and if it should ever be fulfilled, its smoke will only serve to remind you of your shame!

The California Press Association will meet in Oroville in April, and there is no doubt but what proper measures will be taken for the proper reception and entertainment of the National Editorial Association which is to meet in San Francisco in May next. Regarding the receptions and entertainments which have heretofore been tendered to visiting organizations to our state, there has been altogether too much gush and rot and too much of a desire on the part of the "prominent citizen" to push himself to the front on all such occasions at the expense of the community in which he lives, and who only succeeds in making himself very obnoxious to his fellow-citizens and repulsive to their guests. The result of this method of entertaining is simply to "dull the palm of entertainment," and the visitor leaves our state with the impression that all we have to boast of is climate and hospitality. Treating of this subject, the Record-Union makes the following pertinent remarks:

We should provide them transportation—that is the office of the host; we should escort them and respond to their inquiries—that is an obligation of the receiver of visitors; we should entertain them in unaffected and unostentatious effort—that is the duty of hospitality. But let us hereafter cease to bore our guests, reject programme-herding of them, and above all, resolutely resolve that we will no more corral and talk them to death. It does us no good; it is undignified and inhospitable; it makes an unfavorable impression upon the helpless guest; it gives to our receptions a selfish and insincere character. Could the after-comments in which our visitors indulge in the privacy of their communing be published to us, they would, we fear, flatter neither our vanity nor our taste.

Of the 800 or more representatives that are expected to be present at the meeting of the National Editorial Association every section of the United States will be represented, and the incalculable benefit which our state will derive from this meeting cannot be overestimated. We are certain that the Southern Editorial Association and the California Press Association, when they come together for the purpose of arranging a programme for the proper reception and entertainment of their guests, that it will be of such a character as will meet with liberal responses from all parts of our state, and will be more than appreciated by the members of the national association.

It is evident that the leading democratic politicians consider New York the great battle ground in the next national contest. Actuated by this idea no effort, fair or foul, is being spared to secure the electoral vote of New York for the democratic nominee. The plan to so gerrymander the state by the present legislature, which has been captured by trick and fraud, is one of the steps looking toward securing the electoral vote despite any republican majority that might exist in that state. The total votes of states which are surely democratic foots up 172. With Indiana and New York added would make 223. If there is no change made by the present congress, the total electoral vote will be 444, which will require 223 to elect. Thus the solid south, with Indiana and New York would give the desired number of electors. The state of Michigan has changed its form of electing electors, so as to name them by congressional districts; this was brought about by democratic gerrymandering, and will probably give 6 votes in the electoral college for the democratic candidates despite the republican majority in the state. The same tactics are likely to be invoked in New York. With the six votes from Michigan, and those of Connecticut and Montana, the democrats can without Indiana. But without New York there is no possibility for the democracy to win. The possible admission of Arizona would make some change in the electoral vote. The doubtful states are Connecticut, Indiana, Michigan, Montana, and New York.

The republican party leaders must direct their attention to these doubtful states, particularly New York, and no man should be nominated that does not have the favor of the entire republican party of that state. Our tactics must be of the aggressive order in the campaign, and in New York we are in a position to pursue the policy of attack. The democracy will be on the defensive, which is, in politics, always the most difficult to bring success. It was the fact that two years ago the republican party was forced into an attitude of defense of the tariff laws. That caused defeat. The situation now has been reversed. The fact has been demonstrated that there was no foundation for the democratic predictions of higher prices and evil consequences from the tariff laws. The law has proved to be advantageous, and has been fully vindicated. Republicans are not called upon to defend them. The republicans never won a victory by operating on the defensive, nor can the democracy win in a defensive campaign, which is their position now.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government Was Formed from Chaos.

PART XXIII.

Continuing from part xxii of this series the proceedings of the city council on February 5th, 1850, on the report submitted to that body by H. P. Woodworth, the engineer employed by the committee of citizens to inaugurate measures to construct a levee around the city. On motion of councilman Miles it was resolved that the communication be received, that the city engineer be instructed to take the necessary levels and surveys therewith connected, and to report to the city council a full statement of his operations, as well as an estimate of the necessary expenses to effect the same. That four commissioners—two from the council and two from the citizens—be appointed to act in conjunction with the city engineer in locating the proposed levee. And thereupon the council appointed as such commission Hardin Bigelow and Barton Lee from the citizens, and councilmen Warbass and Smith from the council. It was further resolved by the council that the city engineer and the commissioners have power to employ such assistants as they might require, at the expense of the city council. And thus the matter of constructing a levee to secure the city against overflow was confided to such commission.

At this meeting of the council a communication from Dr. Bridgeman was received, requesting permission to cut down two trees on the levee. His request was granted.

The following accounts were allowed: To J. W. Carr, for use of boat, $100; to Linda Company, use of boat, $150.

The report of the committee appointed to examine the account of Dr. Snyder was received, and a warrant for $231.73 was ordered to issue for the same.

The committee to whom was referred the account of D. J. Lisle reported that they had examined the same and allowed $1,030 for the use of a boat manned and managed by him.

The account of Dr. Hazan was received and referred to councilmen Rogers and Warbass, who reported the same back allowing $9 per day, instead of $16 per day charged, and the sum of $387 was allowed him.

The account of Fisher Folkes, for digging graves, was referred to councilmen Warbass and Rogers, and the council adjourned.

The council again met February 9th, 1850.

It allowed an account in favor of Smith, Bensley & Co. for $532.50.

A communication from Albert Priest was received, containing a draft for $1,000 as a donation to be paid on the first Wednesday after the work of building a levee around the city shall have been commenced. This communication was ordered on file, and the secretary was directed to communicate to Albert Priest the grateful acknowledgment of the president and council for his generous donation.

The following resolutions offered by councilman

E. J. C. Kewen were unanimously adopted: 1. "That the occupation of the streets and public landings by persons whose property was inundated during the late flood was just and reasonable;" 2. "That the water having abated so as to enable persons to occupy their own property, and the public interests demanding the removal of such obstructions as soon as possible, the president is hereby directed to issue a proclamation notifying all persons to remove from the landings, streets and public lots of the city on or before the 25th day of February, 1850." The council then adjourned to Tuesday, February 13, 1850; but it did not again meet until February 21, 1850; when it met, pursuant to a call from the president, at 4 P. M., John Lacroze acting as secretary pro tem.

The proprietors of the Placer Times had previously presented their account, which had been referred to a committee. That committee on this day asked for further time. That time was granted. Councilman Warbass was added to the committee, and the committee was instructed to call on the publishers of that paper for a detailed statement of this account. The following accounts were presented and allowed, and warrants ordered to issue in payment thereof: Thomas Brewster, $45.60; Haight & Mayhew, $75; Pacific News, $80; Clark & Godfrey, $380; John Lacroze, $1,200; N. C. Cunningham, $400; Wm. Glaskin, $813.32.

The council again convened, pursuant to adjournment, on February 23, 1850.

The first business was the receipt of the resignation of Jacob R. Snyder as a member of the council. The reason given was that he intended to at once leave the state. This communication was received and the resignation accepted. The council then proceeded to ballot for his successor, Councilman Rogers acting as teller. On counting the ballots it was found that Mr. E. Meconnekin had received a majority of the votes cast, and he was declared elected a member of the council. He thereupon was introduced, took his oath of office and was seated as a member.

The following accounts were then presented and allowed: John H. Harper, $1,258.50; Covillaud, Favard & Co., $22.50; E. Meconnekin, $648; S. M. Miles, $300. The accounts of doctors Hazard and Taylor and Dr. I. F. Snyder were received and referred to a committee composed of councilmen Miles, White and Rogers.

It is to be regretted that these accounts are not extant, as they would tend to illustrate the particulars of the business done by the city council at that early date.

The council again met the next day at 10 A. M., at the store of E. Meconnekin. The secretary made his report of the amount of accounts allowed by the council up to that date, which was, on motion, ordered spread on the minutes. The secretary informed the council that at the request of Col. A. M. Winn, president, he had issued warrants to the amount of $6,000. The warrants reissued are numbered and payable as follows: No. 75, John A. Sutter, $1,312.50; No. 76, Franklin Bates, $1,312.50; No. 77, Elisha O. Crosby, $1,312.50; No. 78, B. Simmons, $1,406.25; No. 79, N. E. Smith, $656.25. These warrants were issued in payment of the following warrants surrendered: Nos. 11, 14, 15, 17, 18, and 19, for $1,000 each, and payable to A. M. Winn.

On motion of councilman Gillespie, it was resolved that the secretary be requested to inform N. C. Cunningham (marshal) that the council would meet tomorrow at the store of E. Meconnekin to hear his report on the progress he had made in clearing the levee and public lots of the city of the occupants.

The report of the secretary shows the accounts allowed by the council to February 26, 1850, as follows: Thomas Coulter, $24; John Lacroze, $42; Joseph Wheelwright, $10; A. C. Bonnell, $16; St. Louis Exchange, $255; J. C. Zabriskie, $680; Hungerford & Bryant, $58; Hazard & Taylor, $72; Abraham Thorpe, $147; Hazard & Taylor, $41.15; Manson & Frolie, $120; — McNulty, $80; A. M. Winn, $801; H. S. Benedict, $160; — Eastman, $100; C. W. Coote, $361.05; Thomas Bannister, $8; James Dean, $8; A. M. Winn, $11,357; C. Morrell, $800; N. C. Cunningham, $800; C. H. Miller, $600; Murray Morrison, $425; C. C. Sackett, $300; E. Meconnekin, $1,275; Morse & Stillman, $3,815; Deal & Morton, $2,500; J. W. Carr, $100; Linda Co., $150; J. F. Snyder, $2,573; D. J. Lisle, $1,130; Hazard & Taylor, $387; Smith, Bensley & Co., $532; Thos. Bannister, $45.60; Haight & Mayhew, $75; Pacific News, $80; Clark & Godfrey, $380; John Lacroze, $1,200; N. C. Cunningham, $400; Wm. Glaskin, $813.32; John H. Harper, $1,250.50; Covillaud, Favard & Co., $22.50; E. Meconnekin, $645; S. M. Miles, $300. Total, $34,695.12.

If the bills allowed could be produced the doings of the city council would be thoroughly illustrated. But after this lapse of time we can hardly expect they will ever be brought to light. Some future "Dryasdust" may examine papers hidden away in some box kept for that purpose; but when the bill consolidating the city and county in 1858 was passed all archives of the city passed into the custody of the board of supervisors.

ors, and they have never been all returned to the city authorities. Old residents of this city will recognize many of the names of those drawing moneys from the city treasury. Some of those names have often appeared in this series of articles. C. Morrell was for some years a prominent druggist of the city. C. C. Sackett was a justice of the peace in 1850, and as such took part in cases arising out of the affair of August 14th, 1850. John F. Morse was a prominent physician here, who wrote a history of the city, and established a lucrative practice, having his headquarters at the northeast corner Second and K streets, Dr. Cluness being his successor. W. Grove Deal was a prominent physician here, with Sutter's fort as his headquarters. D. J. Lisle established a ferry across the American river in 1849 (Frank Hereford being his partner), and later represented Sacramento county in the assembly.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The theaters in London regularly employ over 12,000 people.

"All flesh is grass," said the barn-storming tragedian, as he thrust a handful of hay into the calves of his tights.

The empress of Japan is distinguished for her musical taste and ability, and, in particular, plays the koto—a Japanese instrument resembling the zither—with great success.

Ellen Terry's superb wig of white hair which she wears in Irving's production of Henry VIII was cut from her mother's head to relieve neuralgia, and made up into a wig for the daughter.

Bernhardt never wears jewels next the face. She claims that they detract from the sparkle and beauty of her eyes, and that it is suicidal to a woman's good looks to wear anything flashy next the face.

Jean Lasalle, the great baritone, says: I do not believe it possible to make others feel what you do not feel yourself. Often, when on the stage, I shed tears unconsciously and find myself so deeply interested in the character I am portraying as to be oblivious of my surroundings.

Opera in Vienna is heard under delightful conditions. People go into the building as quietly as they enter a church; not a whisper is heard after the orchestra begins to play; the ventilation, heat and light of the house are perfect. The opera, in Vienna, is as much an affair of state as the army, and is supported in the same way—by a settled, annual income. The result is that opera is better rendered in Vienna than in Berlin.

Judic's jewels and other treasures brought absurdly low prices at the auction sale by which she disposed of them. A diamond necklace worth $6,000 was sold for $1,900, and the laces were almost given away, one fine princess dress in point applique going for $19. But the greatest sacrifice of all was a life size portrait of the actress, painted by M. Aime Pierret, an artist of talent, and exhibited at the salon of 1878. It was bought by a colored man for $70.

"The Growler," who writes "About Player Folk" in the Chicago Post, says: That it is not an easy matter to shake off at once the habits acquired by a lengthy experience in one particular kind of pursuit, is the Growler's firm opinion; and at present comedian Dixey is passing through this difficult task in connection with his evolution from burlesque to legitimate light comedy. On the opening night of The Solicitor in New York an amusing instance occurred illustrating this fact. He was standing in the wings waiting for the curtain to go up, when he stuck out one of his famous graceful legs, and, while standing on the other, he twirled the outstretched member into a variety of rapid and graceful contortions. Ceasing this, he began bobbing up and down a number of times, drawing his legs in and out after the manner of grotesque dancers. Mrs. Buchanan watched the proceedings with unfeigned surprise, and exclaimed: "What in the world are you doing?" "Oh, only limbering up," replied Dixey. "Limbering up? What for?" inquired the handsome actress. "Why—to go on—oh, I forgot!" said Dixey when it suddenly dawned upon him that there was no occasion to "limber up" in his new line of business. He has recovered from the habit now.

The daughter of Osman Pasha, the hero of Plevna, has become somewhat famous in Turkey of recent years for her poetical gifts. She lives on the heights of Pera, in a house that overlooks the blue Bosphorus and the minarets of Constantinople, where every prospect pleases, and there is enough of poetry in the scene to inspire even a prose writer. Though one of the sultan's subjects, she has a great fondness for the civilization of western Europe, and is well versed in the languages and literatures of Germany, France and England. She is young, not more than 28, but as she was married to a rich nobleman when only 13 her view of life has been extensive.

Jules Lemaitre predicts that by the year 2000 there will be no more poets. About that time there will be more piety in newspaper offices and some depression in the waste-basket business.

Dickens was a short-hand writer, and he said once that the accomplishment was as hard to acquire as a half dozen modern languages, and much less valuable. But the stenography he knew was the primitive and complex system, devoid of modern labor-saving make-shifts.

There is hardly a more popular author in the country, certainly not in the south, than Thomas Nelson Page, whom the Harpers have chosen to succeed Charles Dudley Warren as editor of the "Drawer" in their monthly magazine. Mr. Page is still a young man, a lawyer in good practice in Virginia, and a man of interesting personality. It has been said of him that he resembles the type of old Virginia gentlemen that he loves to portray, though that description would hardly seem to fit with the sandy hair and elaborate sandy mustache that mark his features.

Sir Edwin Arnold forgot that he was in Boston when he wrote as original, in an autograph album, a very pretty quadrain called "Life," running thus:

Let us be like the bird, an instant lighted
Upon a branch that swings,
She feels it yield, yet sings on unafrighted,
Knowing she hath her wings.

Someone chanced to repeat it in presence of Miss Kate Sanborn, who instantly remarked that there was a surprising similarity between these lines and those of Victor Hugo:

Be like the bird,
Who, halting in her flight
Awhile on boughs too slight,
Feels them give way beneath her and yet sings,
Knowing that she has wings.

It may be admitted that Sir Edwin's is the more musical setting, but the idea is unquestionably Victor Hugo's.—Boston Advertiser.

David C. Murray, in the Contemporary Review, expresses some splendid ideas upon the literature of the day. He does not agree with a recent writer who has set on record his despairing belief that all the stories have been told, a conclusion in which there is a surface truth, but a profound fallacy. "It is quite true," he says, "that there is no great passion the workings of which have not been exposed in many forms, but the combinations of human interest are simply infinite. All the stories were told before the days of 'Monte Cristo,' before the time of Shakspeare, before the 'Decameron' delighted men, before the great unknown Arab wrote the Book of Job. It is likely enough that men in the Stone Age had told all the stories in the simple sense, and had made all the primeval jokes on which the humor of a later world is founded. Charles Reade said, very wisely, 'When everybody can see how a story will end, the story is ended.' A story nowadays is not the narration of an event but the history of the encroachment of personality on personality, with its accompanying illustrations of morals and manners. It is no wiser to say that all the stories have been told, and therefore to advise writers of fiction to lay aside the most difficult but most charming portion of their work, than it would be to advocate the suppression of chess, or whist, or billiards, on the ground that all the games had been played. Even if every possible combination in each had been exhibited, which is, of course, out of question, all the potentialities can never have been exhausted in any one of them by any one person. The most practiced and assiduous chess-player finds novel developments in every thoughtful game he plays, and wide as the world of chess is, the world of tragedy and humor is a little larger. Originality, to use the word simply, may not be looked for. An original man would have to come to us from another planet. The man who writes and speaks in any known language is, in a sort, a plagiarist. The man who addresses himself to the public must make himself intelligible, and to do this must employ many formulæ which are as old as the beginnings of intelligence. It may be assumed with tolerable safety, that if ever the craft of creative fiction shall die out among men it will not wither for want of new and interesting stories. All the stories will not have been told, all the songs will not have been sung, all the music will not have been drawn from wire and catgut or blown through brass and reed until all the people have come and gone and the last man lies unburied. The invention of great stories is still possible, and to be great they not only need not be, but must not be, original. They will always have to hold in solution the ancient elements, but must perforce hold them in such combined proportion as to offer something of a novel flavor to the taster. For my own part, I no more expect an original drama than an original dinner, but one may not unfairly look to each for nutriment, and expect in each taste, skill and discernment. All great novels, plays and poems offer the staple emotional foods of humanity. There is no new emotion discoverable."

Home doctoring in nearly every case is an invitation to the gratified undertaker.

You can't prove anything about a physician's smoking habits by the number of cigarette cases he has on hand.

The greatest men have often done no more than to make existence miserable for themselves in order that posterity might have occasional diversion in talking of their deeds.

Not long ago a London preacher indulged in a little bit of sarcasm over a small collection, and he did it very neatly. "When I look at the congregation," said he, "I ask: Where are the poor? and when I look at the collection, I ask: Where are the rich?"

A preacher in Texas tells the Southern Advocate why his people should pay his salary. He says "If I aint a big preacher, I can get as hungry and cold as Sam Jones or Talmage. Some think a preacher can live on wind. He can, if he can get bread and meat to go with it."

Congressman Hatch is said to have cured himself of a strong taste for liquor ten years ago by adopting Edmund Burke's cure-all of hot water. He drank quantities of it, and thinks he derived great benefit from it. It stimulated him without any of the reactionary effects that follow stimulation from drinking alcoholic liquors.

Senator Morrill's oratory is of the severely classical order, but he knows the benefit of using metaphors occasionally, as he showed in his recent speech on silver, when he said: "Dynamite may not bring rain from the clouds, but the showers of financial balloonists will not fail to bring portentous monetary storms upon our people."

Gladstone has never used tobacco. He drinks very little—so little, indeed, for a British statesman, as to amount almost to abstinence. A glass of bitter beer at luncheon and a glass of claret or port at dinner form the limit of his indulgence in stimulants. What an anchorite they would have thought him in the days of Pitt and Fox and the three-bottle prime ministers!

Bishop Wilberforce's most notable discomfiture was in 1860, when, at a meeting of the British association, he made an eloquent assault on Darwin's "Origin of Species," and, asking Huxley whether he was related to an ape on his grandfather's or grandmother's side, receiving an answer not less memorable than Dean Stanley's to those who sneered at Bishop Colenso in convocation. "If there were an ancestor," said Huxley, "whom I should feel shame in recalling, it would be a man—a man of restless and versatile intellect, who, not content with an equivocal success in his own sphere of activity, plunged into scientific questions with which he has no real acquaintance, only to obscure them with an aimless rhetoric, and distract the attention of his hearers from the real point at issue by eloquent digressions and skilled appeals to religious prejudice."

It is not always expedient for a physician to make a confidant of his patient, as the following story shows: A celebrated German physician was once called upon to treat an aristocratic lady, whose only trouble was that she ate too much and took no exercise. Instead of telling her, however, he said to her: "Arise at 5 o'clock, take a walk in the park for one hour, then drink a cup of tea, then walk another hour and take a cup of chocolate. Take breakfast at 8." Her condition improved visibly, until one fine morning the carriage of the baroness was seen to approach the physician's residence at lightning speed. The patient dashed up to the doctor's office, and on his appearing on the scene, she gasped out: "Oh, doctor, I took the chocolate first." "Then drive home as fast as you can," ejaculated the astute disciple of Esculapius, rapidly writing a prescription, "and take this emetic. The tea must be underneath." The grateful patient complied. She is still improving.

During the flood winter of 1861-62 in Sacramento, Mr. Henry Watson, the brilliant editor of the Sacramento Union, indulged in stimulants to such an extent that a consultation of the proprietors was held, and it was determined by them that Mr. Watson must either abandon his frequent libations or resign his position on the Union, and he was so informed of their ultimatum. When Mr. Anthony acquainted Watson of the conclusion arrived at by himself and partners, the latter gentleman expressed himself as being very sorry for his actions, and promised them reformation at once, remarking that he "did not like the thought of leaving Sacramento at the present time, for it seemed so much like an American Venice, where gondolas were plentiful, and every man was his own godolier." Mr. Watson pulled himself together, and afterwards from his pen came war articles upon the rebellion which added to his fame as a brilliant writer and a profound thinker, and gave to the Union a greater prestige than it had ever before attained.

The Chinese make what is called "chiwah-hi," or grass-cloth, from the fibre of the common nettle. It is said to make a splendid cloth for tents, awnings, etc. When made into belting for machinery it is said to have twice the strength of leather.

The Austria minister of finance has recommended to the government that women be allowed to practice medicine. This was a result of the number of Mohammedan women living in Austria, who refuse to be attended by any but women physicians.

John S. Wickham, the oldest man in Iowa, died the other day, at the age of 120 years. For the past few years of his life he has refused to wear breeches. As he died of la grippe, the supposition is that he took off his pants so his complaint could get a better hold.

The sacred standard at Constantinople is believed to be formed of the nether garment of Mohammed, and a pair of his pyjamas, which are reverently preserved at Lahore, and are held by the faithful to have miraculously extinguished a fire at that place no longer ago than 1890.

The kind of reform we need is the reform that teaches men to look up. Labor is honorable; honest labor is commendable. Intelligence is working its way into all fields of labor. Some of the alleged labor reformers seek only to live without work, and are constantly working to that end.

If politics is impure it is essentially because a very large portion of upright citizens do not care enough about making public life pure to exert themselves to that end. But they could put an end to political uncleanness with startling effectiveness if they only chose to unite for that purpose.

When we contemplate the vast amount of periodical literature, it discloses how impossible it is for us to keep up with it. Ours has been called the age of brevity, but when we note the "padding" and "space" productions we are constrained to say that it does not apply to current literature.

It is an odd family that does not take a newspaper at this age and stage of the world. It sheds a gleam of intelligence around; it is a communicant of all important events, a never-failing source of amusement, and has an inexhaustible supply of instruction. The man who neglects to read the papers is deficient in the duties of a good citizen.

How funny it seems to see a lot of old maids, which compose some of the great female reform societies, discussing the question of "How to Manage Husbands." These forlorn creatures talking about managing that which they never were able to secure, is supremely ridiculous. It is a little like those people who know just how a newspaper should be managed, although they never wrote a line or had any interest in a newspaper. As a matter of fact, we would pity the poor husband that might fall a victim to one of these old spinsters.

San Francisco came within an ace of securing the democratic national convention. The fight was made by Matt Tarpey, after he got on the ground (Washington), the day before the national committee met. And some are mean enough to assert that the effort would have been a success had not Ed Curtis been about the town as a representative of the democratic party.

It would be difficult to invent a greater degree of infamy than has been manifest by the democratic press of the Examiner order in regard to the administration in the Chile affair. It seems impossible for such cattle to discard rank partisanship for patriotism. In the president's treatment of the Chile question there has been unusual forbearance, dignity, calmness, and an absolute disregard of politics. With this class of hide-bound partisans nothing can be done by the opposition which is right, and every act must be the target of vituperative abuse.

From all outward indications, there is likely to be a pretty general mess of local politics in the approaching municipal election. Those least calculated to direct political affairs are to the front desiring to control certain municipal offices, not in the interest of the public, but for personal gain. We look to the convention which is to assemble on Monday, to attend to this matter and see to it that men not under the control of sinister and corrupt individuals are selected as the nominees of the party. We regret to mention this matter in this manner, but it is apparent to the naked eye.

There has been a harvest of death during the past few months. Last week was prolific of deaths among the Argonauts of '49." Ex-Secretary of State W. C. Hendricks, one of the best-known and most popular men in this state, was called to his rest; Albert Leonard, a prominent pioneer, also yielded to the last summons; W. C. Felch, also an Argonaut and an estimable citizen, was stricken down without warning; T. W. Palmer, one of the early settlers of the territorial days, passed to the dark unknown. It seems that Death's shafts have been hurled with deadly aim at the old pioneers. At this rate it will not be long before the race of these hardy old adventurers will become extinct. There is no recruiting of the depleted ranks. None realize the steady and sure approach of the end more than these sturdy old veterans.

Last week Cardinal Manning, one of the princes of the Catholic Church and an eminent citizen and publicist of England, died. His death called forth loving paegyrics from the canons of the Anglican Church, the rabbis of that country's synagogue, and eulogies from the nobility and the royal family and from every crowned head of Europe. America bent lowly in mourning over the bier of the first, best friend of the world of laboring men. The press of the United States, with no exception, honored his memory in well-deserved tributes of sorrow over his loss. But it was reserved for the Los Angeles Express to cap the climax of the ridiculous while treating of the subject and making the announcement of the death of the eminent churchman. In its spirit of enterprise, and to keep pace with its contemporaries, that paper undertook to give a "cut," or picture, of the deceased cardinal. The result of the effort of the Express to recall those distinguished features was a popular woodcut of Dan Manning, now dead, who was President Cleveland's first secretary of the treasury. Was it ignorance on the part of the Express to permit this blunder? That is impossible. It looks more like the stupid effort at a joke on the part of some senseless booby about the office, without the knowledge of the editor till it was too late to correct the witless strain of the fellow, who should have been instantly discharged.

Miss Kate Field came out here with the press association, and she and Mrs. Frank Leslie-Wilde divided the great enthusiasm with which the ladies of the company were received everywhere in California. But Miss Field could not let this one occasion pass by pleasantly, as it was in all other respects, without showing her strong-minded, masculine tendencies. The gentlemen of the association were given a banquet at the Palace Hotel by the press club of San Francisco one of the last evenings the visitors spent in that city. No ladies were invited, for no special reasons except it may be that "the boys" wanted an hour or two by themselves, just once, before they would part company. But the cranky Kate could not bear to think those horrid men might be telling little yarns that she could not hear. So, as she was attending another banquet, given to her and her fellow-sojourners by the ladies of the press club, she was so full of wrath that she scarce had room for more substantial provender, and could not contain her dignity till she relieved her stomach of the accumulated bile by giving the male portion of the press gang an unstinted piece of her mind for not inviting her and her sister-travelers to the big feed at the Palace Hotel, although no other lady had thought anything about it. She registered an oath then and there that it was the last time she would ever travel with that crowd. Miss Field should remember that there are times when men like to be by themselves and indulge in and enjoy a little chat at which it would be highly improper for females to be present—especially if they call themselves ladies—and such social gatherings of men make them none the less gentlemen nor none the less respectful toward or admirers of ladies or their society. But Kate Field is of that class of the copper-lined of her sex who, if a party of the gentlemen with whom she travels would suggest that they retire to the shade of a clump of sycamores on the bank of the Sacramento river and go into its limpid waters for a swim, she, too, would insist on being one of the crowd.

The Incas Skilled in Metals.

At the time of Pizarro's conquest there were sent to Spain remarkable pieces of gold and silver work. This trade was a monopoly of the crown. The Inca and his family encouraged these artificers. Gold was hammered into the thinness of the finest note-paper and with a perfection of delicacy. It was used to cover the roof of a house or the side of a temple, or a litter, which looked like gilt work, but was really of beaten gold. Of this were cast and moulded figures of animals and human beings and vegetable products. An ear of corn was rendered perfectly, even to its tassels of silk. Gold butterflies were pretty toys that, thrown into the air, would fly fifteen or twenty feet before alighting, their wings being arranged so as to float them. The workmanship of these gave value to the tiny amount of metal used. One Spanish colonel of late times who had accumulated 5,000 of these butterflies from ancient tombs desired to sell them, and found they were worth $200 in silver, there being only 15 cents worth of gold employed in each. Specimens of thin modern filagree work in silver were displayed resembling the best work of Genoa and Stockholm.

Obeyed Orders at a Doctor's Expense.

Dr. Batty Tuke, the eminent Edinburgh psychologist, had a laughable experience the other day.

A Scotch laborer was engaged in the grounds of the doctor's asylum, near Edinburgh, and had received injunctions to pay no attention whatever to the remarks of the patients who noticed him.

Some little time after Dr. Tuke, looking at the progress of the work, mildly suggested an alteration. The workman dug solidly on and never lifted his head. The doctor raised his voice, the man dug energetically. The doctor threatened, stormed, and finally thundered out: "Do you know who I am?"

The son of the soil straightened his back, looked at him for a minute, and, shaking his head sorrowfully, exclaimed: "Puir deleerious cratur, I'm sorry for ye!" and went on calmly with his work.—Tid-Bits.

Not a Fool's Paradise.

The soul of a rajah, who has been released from the cares of this world and an uncongenial wife, presented himself at the gates of Paradise. "Have you been in Purgatory yet?" demanded Brahma. "No; but I have been married." "Enter then—it is the same thing." At this moment another soul arrived, who begged Brahma to allow him also to enter. "Softly, softly—have you been in Purgatory yet?" "No; but neither has that other fellow—he died the same day I did." "Very true, but he had been married." "Married, indeed! Why, I have been married three times." "Away, then, to the lower regions," said Brahma, sternly; "Paradise is not made for imbeciles."

How Prairie Dogs Get Water.

It has always been a subject of curiosity and inquiry as to how and where prairie dogs, living on the prairie far away from any river or stream, obtain their water. Mr. F. Leechi, a frontiersman of experience, asserts that the dogs dig their own wells, each village having one with a concealed opening. He knows of one such well two hundred feet deep, and having a circular staircase leading down to the water. Every time a dog wants a drink he descends the staircase, which, considering the distance, is no mean task. In digging for water the animals display as much pluck as they do in resisting the efforts of settlers to expel them from the land of their progenitors.

In England the words "selling off at an alarming sacrifice," "bankrupt stock," and so forth, in great red letters in a shop window are not necessarily considered as plain statements of facts to which the tradesman would be prepared to swear in the witness box. It is otherwise in France, or it will be probably, in consequence of a solemn decision recently given in the law courts. The judges have condemned a shopkeeper at Tours for falsely representing that he was selling off a bankrupt stock, "seeing," says the judgment, "that it is manifest that the tradesmen selling goods by means of such false representations succeed in drawing customers to their shops who would otherwise have patronized other firms."

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber and Elder Flower Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles; and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hair-dressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her little book "How to be Beautiful." Sample bottle mailed free to any lady on receipt of SAMPLE BOTTLE of 10 cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. Lady Agents wanted.

A pretty girl is a subject worth pursuing.
Many families have skeletons on storage.
The finger of scorn is often a troublesome member.

Many girls boast of habits and practices that are unladylike.

A corkscrew not only draws the cork, but often draws the man out.

The need of the hour is the capable management of our city affairs.

The big head on the man is about as bad as the big hat on the woman.

When we have to wait for inspiration the opportunity has always passed.

The public may sometimes be unjust, but it is oftener the victim of injustice.

It seems that many of the labor reforms are more to abolish work than poverty.

It is woman's nature to be dissatisfied; inconsistency and discontent are ever with them.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Manager Norton has done a good business this week at the Clunie Opera House with A Million of Money. The company grows in public favor. Next week a new programme.

Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah will be produced by the Sacramento Choral Society on February 4th, at the Metropolitan. It will be presented in a grand style, under the direction of W. H. Kiuross, and with the largest chorus ever heard in this city.

Carleton's Opera Company filled the Metropolitan last night. Indigo, an opera new to the Sacramento public, was given in a finished manner. The Gondoliers is booked for to-night. This is also the first time of the opera in this city. Matinee this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Matters Educational.

During this week the board of education made the annual inspection of the schools, with the view of determining the needs for the next year. From the needs that are apparent and which reasonably appeal to the sound and intelligent judgment of men, there is no question the full percentage of the municipal tax contemplated by the charter should be levied. We have not the space to refer in detail to that which was manifest to the members of the board; will, however, speak of them hereafter. There is no use to stint in the matter of the education of our children. Parents, who are directly interested, certainly desire the schools will be maintained to the very best standard. Four of the present board of education were pupils in the public schools, and had opportunity this week to contrast that which did exist with the condition of to-day. To them in particular it was a retrospective view that was of interest; time will come pupils in the department now will look upon a picture similar. Let it be to them there will be the same satisfaction; that they will see the world moves, and that educational advantages are becoming more perfect.

Ladies, send a two cent stamp to Mrs. C. Birdsall, 707 I st., Sacramento, and receive something of vital importance to you. *

A Pretty Law-breaker.

Writes Justin McCarty in a volume of "Recollections of Parliament," about American visitors to the house of commons: A reminiscence comes to my mind. The American girl has no respect for musty traditions. Some years ago we used to be permitted to take ladies into the library, but the rule was strict that they must not be allowed to sit down there. I was once escorting a young American married woman through the various rooms of the library, and I mentioned to her, as a matter of more or less interesting fact, that it was against the rules for a woman to sit down there.

"Is that really a law of the place?" she asked, with wide opened and innocent eyes. "The very law," I answered. "Then," said she, calmly, "just see me break it!" and she drew a chair and resolutely sat down at the table.

Gadding Wives.

A certain man became so interested in the subject of "Where Are We Going To?" that he called together a number of his friends to see whether their troubles were similar to his own. All of the men agreed that it was impossible to get wives nowadays to stay at home and boil the kettle. "Where," asks one of these gentlemen, "are our wives? In the streets," he answers, "at teas, lunches, dinners, in the shops, traveling abroad, or away for an 'outing,' at Browning clubs, faith cure seances, women's rights meetings, Ibsen reunions, Meredith mornings, Blavatsky circles, indigent female rescues, arriving emigrants' shelters, mothers' meetings, church sociables, Bulgarian bazaars—anywhere, everywhere, except at home."—New York Advertiser.

California Argonauts' Festivities.

On January 18, 1892, at New York city, the Associated Pioneers of the Territorial Days of California celebrated the forty-fourth anniversary of the discovery of gold at Sutter's saw mill by a grand banquet, at which the following members were present or represented:

1833—Jacob P. Leese. 1846—Gen. Edward F. Beale and Wm. Colligan. 1847—Francis D. Clark, William H. Rogers and John H. Welsh. 1849—Edward R. Anthony, R. G. Berford, Jacob Brinckerhoff, Capt. Wm. F. Blanck, Capt. Samuel L. Clapp, Gardner Q. Colton, H. S. Crandall, Daniel W. Clegg, John S. Ellis, Hon. S. B. French, Col. A. C. Ferris, John Gault, Gen. H. G. Gibson, A. T. Goodell, R. R. Griffith, Jr., George H. Johnson, Cornelius Lydecker, L. L. Lombard, Gilmore Meredith, Hon. R. H. McKune, Capt. R. W. Meade, James J. McCloskey, Joseph M. Pray, Richard J. Paulson, James Hyde Pratt, Silas H. Quint, John Sickles, Joseph S. Spinney, James A. Sperry, Gen. T. W. Sweeny, Hon. Demas Strong, H. B. Schermann, Charles R. Street, Dr. L. S. Straw, John D. Townsend, Henry L. Twiggs, Wm. T. Vredenburg, Wm. M. Walton, Henry Wilson, James M. Wiltie and T. Robinson Warren. 1850—Gen. Francis Darr, Stephen L. Merchant, George B. Roys, Charles W. Schumann, Hon. Mark D. Wilber and Geo. F. Kohler. Sons of pioneers—Frank Sperry and Francis J. A. Darr.

At this banquet no wines other than Californian vintage were used.

The following comprised the exercises and toasts on this occasion: "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," by the assemblage, before seating. Salutation, by Francis D. Clark, president of the society. Announcement of regrets, by Frank Sperry, secretary. "The President of the United States," in response to which the orchestra played Yankee Doodle. "California Pioneers and the Golden State," E. Y. Bell, Esq. "Yosemite," Geo. B. Roys. "Yuba Dam," a reminiscence of mining days, James J. McCloskey. "The nation's marriage to the bride of the Pacific," response by W. W. Goodrich. "Song of the gold digger in 1849," sung by Chas. S. Dodd, the company joining in the chorus. "The day we celebrate," Hon. Mark D. Wilber. Poem, "The mining camp of '49" (then and now), Henry Wilson. "Woman, her influence and value," Nelson Taylor, Jr. "Anniversary hymn," air, Arlington, written by Geo. G. Spurr, Boston, Mass., Secretary "Associated California Pioneers of '49."

The song that once inspired the camp
Along the Yuba's streams,
Comes back to me each winter's night
Like well-remembered dreams.

That land, so full of memories dear,
Has changed since forty-nine;
The soil that once was filled with gold
Now teems with fruit and wine.

Beneath our flag of blue and white
We gather once a year,
And pay the homage due its rank,
In good old-time Revere.

And ere we part, my dear old friend,
Let's drink one cup of wine,
To days of old, to days of gold,
To days of forty-nine.

God bless that fair and favored land,
That land of fruit and wine;
God bless the men that gave her fame—
In eighteen forty-nine.

"The city of New York," Hon. Stephen B. French. Song, "Passing Away," dedicated to this society by the late Samuel C. Upham, sung by Mr. Charles S. Dodd. "Our sister societies of California pioneers," Hon. Demas Strong.

During the evening there were a number of anecdotes and reminiscences by old Californians. At the close of the exercises the company sang the "Song of the Argonauts," or the days of forty-nine, written by the late Samuel C. Upham. When it comes to having a good time the Argonauts are "in it."

President Clark read a communication addressed to W. H. Luther, secretary Sacramento Society of Pioneers, by Mr. Eugene J. Gregory, treasurer board of Sutter's fort trustees, upon the subject of the restoration of Sutter's fort; upon the conclusion of which the Hon. Demas Strong, at one time mayor of Sacramento, moved that the society subscribe not less than $250 towards the work, which was approved by those present.

The gavel used on the festive occasion was made from an old oak timber cut from the old Sutter fort, and sent to New York by the Sacramento Society of Pioneers.

The following is some ancient lore regarding leap year. It is printed in an almanac of 1796, and in the publication it is credited to a book on "Courtship, Love and Matrimony." "Albeit it is now become part of common law in regard to relations of life, that as often as every bissextile year doth return, the ladies have the sole privilege, during the time it continueth, of making love unto the men, which they doe either by wrdes or looks, as to them it seemeth proper; and moreover no man will be entitled to the benefit of clergy who doeth refuse to accept the offers of a lady or who doeth in any wise treat her proposal with slight or contumely."

Wonders of the Trance State.

Prof. William James, a well known Harvard instructor, in speaking of the trance condition and trances in general, says: "I know a woman who in her trances knows facts which altogether transcend her possible normal consciousness—facts about the lives of people whom she never saw nor heard of before. I make this statement deliberately, knowing the liabilities to which it exposes me. My own impressions are that the trance condition is an immensely complex and fluctuating thing, into the understanding of which we have hardly begun to penetrate, and concerning which any very sweeping generalizations are sure to be premature."

World and Success.

A laugh so full of mirth and honest joy,
I hear above the din of mart and street;
It touches tender cords that twine and meet
About the heart—this welcome of my boy.

As the departing sun does banish day,
Our minds forget the folly of the strife
That overwhelms the little gift of life,
That for fourscore years and ten we hold at bay.

Yet in the love and gladness of our home,
Through infant's lips, the Unseen shapes
a dart;

"Poor papa sick," a laugh that "papa's come."

Yes, "papa's sick," the warning fills our heart.

The day's work done, to suit ambition's throne.

The goal being reached, see Charity de-

THE STUDENTS' STORY.

"I'll wager the oysters for the crowd he doesn't undertake it." "Oh, he wouldn't go for a fortune."

These and similar remarks were made by members of a group of medical students who had lingered in the dissecting room of — medical college after the demonstrator had taken his departure. It was almost midnight and the solitary flickering gas jet caused the shadows to dance backward and forward in an uncanny manner.

The subjects on the tables were like the people we daily meet on the streets. A man who had died in prison occupied a table adjoining one upon which a Cæsus was resting. The remains of a society belle lay within arm's length of the body of a burly negro. Next to him was the half-dissected body of a favorite comedian.

It was a cosmopolitan collection. Class and previous social position were not regarded here. But all this was observed by the group of students. At that time the "Anatomy Act," which assigns the deceased prisoners and paupers to medical colleges, had not been passed, and students resorted to various schemes in order to obtain what the coarser ones termed "stiffs."

Miss G——, a young lady, an heiress in her own right, had died suddenly the day preceding the one on which this narrative begins. Her guardian, who, by the way, was her uncle and something of a politician, had summoned the coroner. An inquest had been held and the jury had rendered a verdict of "death from heart failure."
No post mortem examination had been held,
the guardian having informed the coroner, over a social glass, that such a proceeding would grate very harshly on his finer sensibilities.

The students had been discussing the case, and as dissecting material was in demand,
they had concluded to notify Shelby Wise, whose "turn" it was to furnish the next
"subject," that he must shoulder pick and shovel and take an excursion to Greenlawn cemetery that very night, the body having been interred that afternoon.

Wise was a pale, handsome, timid sort of man, and that was what provoked the various opinions expressed at the opening of this narrative. However, a committee proceeded to his room, which was located at some distance from the college. He had already retired, but was soon awakened and told what was expected of him.

"All right, boys, I'll fetch 'er in in great shape," he laughed, while leisurely drawing on his clothes. The other students then scattered to their various homes, and left Wise to get along as best he could with what directions they had given him in regard to the location of grave and precautions to be observed.

"Didn't I tell you so?" "I knew he wouldn't do it?" The speakers were the same who had discussed the matter of obtaining the body of the young lady the previous night, and when they found no additional "subject" at the college in the morning they jumped to the conclusion that Wise was a coward.

The first lecture had begun when Wise entered the amphitheater, so the students must, perforce, suppress their chaffing.
Scarcely had the professor made his closing bow when half a dozen students surrounded Wise and asked:

"Where's the girl?"

"In the wardrobe in my room," he replied. At this there was a general laugh, for nobody believed him. However, he told how extraordinarily long it had taken him to find and open the grave, that he had had much difficulty in opening the casket, and that when he had finally slipped the bag over the body, the first rays of light were appearing in the east, barely giving him time to fill the grave and hurry away with his burden.

Observing that lamps were already burning in several houses, and that people were beginning to stir, he concluded that it would be too hazardous to attempt to reach the college just then, and that he had better leave the body in his room until the following night, when it could readily be transferred. "If you don't believe me," he said,
"come up to my room at noon and I'll let you see her. It's worth your while, too, for she's the first corpse I've ever seen that could be called pretty."

Several accepted the invitation and found that his statement was true in every respect.
"Wise, you're a daisy," was the unanimous verdict.

That night he was to take the body to the college in a hand cart, he being disguised as a banana vender. The students waited until midnight, but in vain. Wise did not come to the college. The following morning he did not appear at the lectures and several of his fellow-students, becoming anxious, called at his room.

The landlady informed them that Mr.
Wise had gone to his room that night and she found his bed undisturbed in the morning, and that she had not heard him depart.

The students knew that she was ignorant of the presence of the dead body, and, in order to ascertain if it was all right, one of them entered Wise's room under some pretext. What was his astonishment to find the wardrobe open and the body gone.

Hastening out, he communicated the result of his search to his companions, and they concluded that Wise must have been arrested while conveying the body to the college.

They expected to see a report of it in the evening papers, but nothing of the kind appeared.

Several days elapsed and no tidings came from Wise. The students then revisited Wise's room and learned from his landlady that she had received a brief note from him, directing her to express his trunks, books, etc., to the Palmer House, Chicago, without delay, as he would remain there but a few days.

He did not explain his sudden departure.
She had carried out his directions and that was all she knew. Wise had always been reticent, so that little was known of his previous life or home. The students were sorely perplexed, but as they could not get at the facts of the case without compromising themselves as accessories to grave-robbing, they concluded to drop the matter.

Mr. H——, the guardian, being the sole heir, had taken possession of the young lady's property and was living sumptuously.
His own property, while not large, netted him a comfortable sum.

About five weeks after Miss G——'s death,
Mr. H—— received a letter addressed in a delicate female hand. At sight thereof he grew deathly pale and staggered to an armchair, into which he fell.

"What," he hoarsely whispered, a "message from the dead?" Gulping down a glass of brandy to steady his unstrung nerves he proceeded to lock the door and then, with trembling hand, opened the letter. "My God, it cannot be," he moaned, "and yet,
'tis the handwriting. Oh, what shall I do!
What shall I do!"

On the same day that Mr. H—— received the mysterious letter which agitated him so much the sexton of Greenlawn cemetery found a pick and shovel hidden under a clump of bushes. A suspicion of ghouls was aroused and all recently made graves were opened and examined.

No bodies had been disturbed except that of Miss G——, and, as we already know, it had been removed by Wise, the medical student. People say that this discovery had unbalanced Mr. H——'s mind, and, indeed, circumstances seemed to warrant the remark, for he went about looking like a mere shadow of his former self. He disposed of all his property.

He did not offer a reward for the recovery of the body of his dead niece or the apprehension of the grave-robbars. When the property was all sold he wrote out a check for $20,000, payable to Mrs. Shelby Wise.
The check he enclosed in an envelope and mailed to Shelby Wise, Esq., Boulevard Row, Boston, Mass.

After this Mr. H—— was often seen under the influence of liquor. He went from bad to worse, and during an attack of delirium tremens, which proved fatal to him, he shouted day and night, "I didn't give it to her! I didn't give it to her, and you can't prove that I did!"

The students of — medical college tell the story to this day, and they always conclude by asking: "Was she dead?"

Why Hair is Curly.

The difference between straight and curly hair is very apparent on a microscopical examination.

A hair is a hollow tube, and a straight hair is as round as a reed, while a curly hair is always flattened on both sides and curls toward one of the flat sides, never toward the edge. It is a curious and little known fact that the hair of women is coarser than that of men, as well as thicker on the scalp.

In an average head of hair there are about 130,000 individual hairs.—Natural Barber.

A German critic thus distinguishes between ridicule, wit, irony and humor: Ridicule is the wit of a stupid or vulgar person; wit the ridicule of a superior intellect or a man of the world; irony the wit of a thinker, and humor the irony of a poet. Ridicule is like a blow with the fist, wit like the prick of a needle, irony like the sting of a thorn, and humor the plaster which heals all these wounds.

How the Domestic Problem Strikes the Infant Mind.

Alice is 7. She was visiting at Teddy's house in the country. Teddy is 6. They were playing "keeping house" the other day when it rained, says the New York Recorder.

"I'll be the father," said Ted, "and go to the office. You are the mother, you must stay at home and dit the dinner."

"No," rejoined Miss Alice, "I must go to business, too. My mamma always puts on her bonnet and goes to the office after breakfast." (Her mother is an editor).

"Who dits the dinner at your house?" asked Teddy, thinking of his stomach.

"Nobody. We get things to eat at some restaurant or we have them sent in."

"Haven't you any kitchen in your house?"

"No; we have only mamma's room, the sitting room, the study and my room. Don't you tell any one, but my room is just a corner of the study behind the screen."

Ted sat thinking. Then, crossing his short, fat, little legs, he said, with the air of a man who has thought much and deeply upon the woman question: "Well, when I dit married I shall have a kitchen in my house and my wife shall cook the dinner. I fink it is funny for mammas to go to offices. I fink they ought to stay at home."

To which the small but progressive woman replied: "It isn't funny one bit. It's a good deal nicer than cooking dinners. When I am grown up I shall have a stylographic pen and wear it behind my ear just like mamma. I am not quite sure, though, whether I shall be a writer-woman or a doctor-woman like Aunt May."

Ted looked at Alice seriously out of his big brown eyes. "I don't fink I'll marry you, then; I was finking I would, maybe."

"I don't care," responded Alice, flippantly. "I've wiped dishes once and I don't like to. You might cook your own dinner and see how you'd like it for awhile. My papa says he can make cocoa just as good as he wants it any day. I don't want to play house with you if you want me to cook dinners. You play you're sick and I'll div you some medicine. Let me feel your pulps; where's your tongue?"

The eavesdropper tiptoed to the door for a peep at these wise children. Alice was standing over Ted trying to keep her mother's eye-glasses on her pug nose. Ted was rocking a scrubby-looking rag baby, and, judging by the dejected look on his rosy face, he felt that the years of servitude predicted by Alice had begun.

The First "Crank."

No word in the English language has been more abused than "crank." It is frequently applied to a cracked-brained, visionary fellow, who is a nuisance and a bore, whereas, its proper meaning is that of an enthusiast on one particular subject, which may or may not be visionary. The origin of the name dates back to 1835.

In that year Morse, the inventor of the telegraph, first made his appearance in Washington, and when congress met he was on hand to try to secure an appropriation of seventeen thousand dollars to build an experimental telegraph line from Washington to Baltimore. He brought along with him his wires, instruments, and electrical generator.

The former he stretched in and around the capitol building, with instruments here and there, and the generator, which was operated with a crank, he placed in a convenient location and secured the services of a man to do the generating.

The experiment created intense interest among the members of congress, especially among the northern members of the senate. They became so absorbed in Mr. Morse and his experiment, and they neglected their business in the senate to such an extent, that that body was frequently without a quorum.

The center of their interest was the crank machine turned by the man in his operation of generating the electric current for the wires. The interest but increased as Mr. Morse each day more clearly demonstrated the practicability of his invention, and the public's business in the senate suffered accordingly.

Finally, Senator Benton's patience became exhausted at the want of a quorum, and, rising in the senate one morning, he said: "Mr. President, it is quite evident to my mind that we will never be able to proceed with business till this crank man and his bill are disposed of; and, with the object of hastening him to fold up his crank and get away from the capitol so we may have the attention of the senators, I move that the bill appropriating seventeen thousand dollars to construct a line between this city and Baltimore be put upon its passage."

As soon as word went out that the bill had been called up, the northern senators flocked into the chamber, and in a few minutes Mr. Morse was happy over the passage of his bill. But from that time on he was known as "Morse the Crank."—Golden Days.

"I warn you," says Emerson, "that no dream of the future is so fair as the scenes and skies, weaving their unheeded enchantment about you to-day, shall appear when you shall look back upon them."

In the man whose childhood has known crosses there is always a fibre of memory that can be touched to gentle issues.—George Eliot.

There are times when a clergyman hardly knows whether to laugh or to cry over the inconsistencies of human nature—even regenerate human nature.

The human body contains one and one-quarter gallons of blood, but the blood corpuscles contained therein, if placed end to end, would reach four times around the globe.

Tomatoes, it is said, were first introduced into this country as an article of food on the table of the Astor House in 1830. In less than two years they were eaten all over the country.

The sapphire and emerald are credited with properties which rendered them capable of influencing ophthalmic disorders, and there is a superstitious belief that serpents are blinded by looking at the latter stone.

Aristotle attempted to weigh air by weighing a bag when empty and again after it had been inflated. The result of this experiment caused him to announce that air had no weight. Without air we could see the stars as plainly during the day as we can at night.

"What! another new dress?" said a married man to his better half, as the parcel was opened. "Don't distress yourself," she replied, "I paid for this out of my own pocket." "Oh, indeed! But where did you get the money from?" "I sold your overcoat," was the cool reply.

There is a curious Welsh superstition connected with the redbreast that far away in a land of woe and fire, day by day does the little bird bear in his bill a drop of water to quench the flame, so near does he fly that his feathers are scorched, and hence he is named "bron-rhuddyn" (breast-burnt).

Horses have a natural dislike of camels in mass, and can scarcely be induced to charge upon a body of these desert animals even when they are lying down and tied. This dislike of the horse for the camel was pointed out by Herodotus in his account of the great Persian war, when Croesus, king of Lydia, was defeated by his cavalry horses fleeing as soon as they scented the camels.

It is said that when Alaric, the Conqueror of Rome, died that "a river was turned aside to make a place in its bed for his grave, and when he was buried the water was again let into its former channel, and the prisoners who had helped to bury him were killed so that no one might find out where the conqueror of Rome was buried." The river thus turned was thy Busento, and the place near Cosento, Italy.

When a cat died a natural death in an Egyptian house the occupants of the dwelling went into mourning and shaved off their eyebrows. When a fire occurred they were more anxious to save the cats than to extinguish the conflagration. Nevertheless, in some parts of the same country cats were regarded as unclean animals, for a creature which was considered sacred in one town was often viewed with horror as impure in a neighboring city.

A Rural Congressman.

"Wal, sir, do you know I've been in this town for a week, eat three meals a day regular, and haven't had any supper yet?" said an M. C. of decided ruralistic appearance in the lobby of one of the leading hotels to another M. C., who represents the boys in the furrows also, but has been here once before, says the Washington Post.

"Well, why don't you eat supper, make it four meals a day, and get the worth of your money?" said the second-termer.

"Whiv, they don't have any supper up here," replied the first-termer. "Now, for instance, one of my senators asked me the other night to take dinner with him at 8:30 o'clock. Confound his old time, I recollect when he used to get up at 4 o'clock in the morning to feed the hogs and horses, and by 8:30 o'clock at night he was sound asleep. Wal, I reckon it all depends upon how and where a man was brought up, but if my wife knew I wasn't eating dinner until 8 o'clock she would think I was being worked to death."

One of the stories told about Prince George is that on one occasion his depredations were of such a character that his father determined to send him penniless and in debt to sea. Shortly afterward the Princess Beatrice brought the first young Battenberg into the world. Congratulations and presents for the baby were in order, and of course Prince George could not be found wanting in courtesy to his little cousin. But he had no money. However, he got a sailor to provide him with a cheap porringer. This he forwarded to the newcomer with an inscription, hoping that he would not be similarly penniless when anxious to make a present to a cousin. The porringer was received, the Prince of Wales laughed, and George was forgiven and his debts were paid.

The republican city convention was held Monday night; its labors are concluded; judgment is yet to be passed by the tribunal of final resort—the people. THEMIS is a republican journal; desires the success of the party of its faith—an honorable ambition with any partizan. As we write we look back at a retrospective picture: that for years past republican nominees for trustees have been “thrown down,” though they have been, in every instance, men entitled to public confidence.

It was not many years ago a republican municipal convention sat in Armory hall to nominate a candidate for mayor; it could not induce one to run, and an adjournment was had to the next evening at the theater, when Hon. Joseph Steffens was nominated. Though a gentleman of state reputation, with a character without blemish, and an ability that would dignify an office in a commonwealth, he suffered defeat. That the strength of the party could have elected him is unquestioned; that he was not elected we will not say is unexplained, he owned himself. Later on Geo. Murray was nominated for third trustee. A false issue was raised against him. Nothing could be urged that he lacked in ability or honesty; yet he was forced out of the fight. Louis Elkus took his place on the ticket. He had been a pioneer resident of the city, prominent in business life, and while removed yet enjoys, and will enjoy, the kindest regard of our citizens. He was beaten; a democrat was elected over him. In 1889 the republicans nominated John Stevens for second trustee. Than him we are not aware there lives in this community one enjoying greater confidence. He bowed not to the powers who did hold the yoke; met sereat. The following year Mr. Comstock was elected mayor; Mr. Gregory, the republican nominee, was defeated at the last moment by those who should have been his friends. Last year Mr. Conklin, the nominee of the citizens' organization, was elected.

There has resulted a peculiar municipal governing board from the last three elections: perhaps one as weak as has ever administered the affairs of a city of 28,000. Distinguished truly, yet not creditably, by its Monday matinees—meetings that should be characterized by dignity. It would seem they should spare our inhabitants the ridicule of others who look upon us.

Now it is the republican party has named a candidate for trustee to be voted for next month—E. H. Green. Already it has been given out that he will be beaten; particularly why would be of interest to know. It was no surprise to us; we heard he would be “knifed;” men of his independence are not desired on the municipal board by the same elements that antagonized the men equally worthy whom we have named. It is about time, however, the people who contribute the revenues for governmental support should take a hand in the matter. That Mr. Green is not worthy and capable is not charged. It is claimed he falls under the ban that the collar fitted unpleasantly on his neck. Mr. Green's nomination came from an element that will support him. If he will be elected there will be no danger he will in any degree pension politicians on the city government. The very fact it has been given out that it is intended Mr. Green will be knifed, and so early in the canvass, should place thinking citizens on their guard. Knifed from what quarter and for what reason?

Daniel W. Higgins is the nominee for chief of police. He is a young man who for many years was employed in the railroad shops. No man stands higher in the estimation of his fellow workmen, and the head men of the several departments of the shops have the warmest commendations for him. For three years he has been a member of the police department, and has made an energetic and faithful officer. He is of a modest and retiring disposition, but firm and brave in the discharge of his official duties. The fact that he gathered around him such a strong array of supporters, and defeated one of the most popular officers in the city, speaks well for his standing, particularly among the younger element of the republican party. His firmness of character is a guarantee that he will make an excellent executive officer. We do not believe that a man of his determination will ever allow any man, or set of men, to dictate his line of action as the head of the police force, or influence him to swerve from upright action. It is the duty of all republicans to give him and the whole ticket their full support.

Hon. E. C. Hart was renominated for city attorney without opposition—a deserved tribute to a capable and popular officer. T. J. Scott was named for fire commissioner. Mr. Scott has the advantage of general popularity; is a successful business man, and in the contest we feel he is abundantly able to take care of himself.

The impulsive Chileans are now rendering tardy justice to minister Egan. As the true light is thrown upon the calm, firm and statesmanlike acts of minister Egan he appears in great favor, and unjust accusations are fast being refuted. His attitude seems better understood now, and his services in protecting many prominent members of the congressional party from the vengeance of the late dictator, and in granting asylum to refugees who sought the American legation after the downfall of Balmaceda, are now generally recognized as both humane and proper. Eduardo Matta, president of the chamber of deputies, and many others whose lives were saved by minister Egan during Balmaceda's dictatorship, favor his retention there as American minister. Augustin Edwards, whose life and property was saved through Egan's influence, is the only prominent member of the old congressional party who now seems anxious to have Egan called home.

There is evidently impending a legal contest between the board of education and the board of trustees. That the matter of the tax levy will be the subject of judicial determination seems manifest from the attitude that has been assumed by the educational board. It is of gratification the board of education has determined to test the question with which body rests the determination of the needs of the public school department: the board elected for that purpose, or the trustees who have, as in this instance, acted superficially. This contest will be one particularly of interest to parents, and it is but right the facts of the case should be fully and fairly stated.

It is made the duty of the city superintendent of public instruction to submit an annual report to the board of education. Such report was so submitted, and was published in detail in the Record-Union of January 5th. Then it is provided in “the Act to provide for the government of the common schools in the city of Sacramento” the following:

The board of education shall, on or before the first day of February, make and report to the board of trustees a statement in detail of the receipts and expenditures for school purposes in the city during the year then last past, and shall at the same time make and furnish a detailed statement of the probable amount of money that will be required during the current year, and the purposes for which it is required, and also an estimate of the amount that will be received by the city from the state and county for school purposes.

Upon receiving the estimate of moneys needed, as provided in section 1, the board of trustees shall, at the time of levying other city taxes, levy a direct special school tax, which, after making proper allowance for delinquencies, will produce a sum that (taken with the estimated amount to be received from the state and county) will make the amount required by the board of education; provided, however, that in no case shall such special school tax exceed 35 cents on the $100 of taxable property.

On the 28th and 29th of last month all of the members of the board of education—eight men who had been selected by the votes of the people—with the superintendent, visited the school buildings and grounds. Each room even was inspected, and the results of their observations have been detailed in the public press. It is unnecessary there should be a recapitulation, as the reports are perhaps fresh in the minds of those interested in popular education. Last Monday the detailed statement required by the law was submitted by the board of education to the board of trustees, and the needs for the maintenance of the school department were demonstrated to require a tax levy of 35 cents on the $100. The trustees arbitrarily cut the rate down to 26 cents. It is manifest the action of the trustees in this regard was without any consideration, for they had before them, and among their own files, figures that would have demonstrated that with that levy the revenue would fall far short of paying the necessary expenses.

It can hardly be understood why men who are well paid to intelligently administer the affairs of the municipality should act with such reckless indiscretion. It would be extremely unfair to hold Major McLaughlin to a statement credited to him, that “the board of trustees had come to the conclusion that the school department could get along with a 26-cent tax, and have money to spare.” We say it would be unfair to him that we have assumed his mind was broad enough to understand the import of plain, ordinary figures.

Among other things seemed to be objected to is the estimate of $25 000 for a new high school-building that the board of education recommended should be erected on the Perry seminary grounds. That such a building is needed will be apparent to any intelligent citizen who will go through the building now used for high-school purposes. It has not escaped the attention of the public that the trustees have been persistent that the board of education shall sell the Perry seminary property; that the latter board have as persistently refused, and the refusal is based upon the broad ground that it is impolitic for a growing municipality to sell ground when unquestionably in a very few years another and more intelligible site will have to be purchased at a fancy price. In this regard the board of education is eminently right. If the board of trustees would manifest a spirit of modern idea there would be erected upon those grounds a school building that would be a credit of the city, one that would supply a pressing want.

The old cry is made: we must first pay off the bondholders. It would seem the policy of the board of education is to make a fight for the education of the children of the city, and if in that regard the bondholders will be made to wait until the obligations they purchased on speculation will be due, we are not aware they will particularly suffer; the city will have the credit of having made provision for public education. As it is now, aside from a couple of school-houses, the city has no creditable public buildings, and were they, with the state and county buildings, removed, Sacramento would be left with the city hall and the fire-engine houses!

The tax levy by the trustees was made Monday. The following afternoon a special meeting of the board of education was held, and that body unanimously resolved to take steps to compel, by legal process, the board of trustees to provide for a sufficient revenue to keep the public schools open during the current year. That they acted so promptly was that the trustees would have opportunity to amend their tax levy, or that in case a mandamus was granted, the city would be saved the expense of the imposition and collection of the deficit tax. Heretofore it has been when insufficient revenue was provided, members of the board of education borrowed the money from a bank on their personal note, and repaid it from the income of the following year. Manifestly this course was in direct violation of the rigid mandate of the state constitution, that all indebtedness contracted in excess of the estimates for the particular year is invalid. In this regard the directors jeopardized their individual properties, for, if protest had been made, they would unquestionably have been compelled to pay the note, and would have been without relief. It is manifest men elected to the board of education should not be expected to take such risks.

At the meeting of the board of education on Tuesday, the situation was carefully discussed, and it was evident from the expressions of the members that, in view of the fact the trustees had made a levy which would be conspicuously inadequate to pay the salaries of the teachers, there was but one present course to pursue: to obtain a judicial determination whether the considerate action of the educational board should be overturned by the trustees, who apparently had not taken the trouble to figure out the revenues that would be yielded and count them with the aggregate of the pay-roll of the school department, from the data they had in the room in which they sat. We might remark incidentally that there has been complaint that impossible problems are submitted to our school children. It would seem the trustees have little trouble to determine that an American dollar will pay one dollar and ten cents and yet leave some to spare! If we really did believe Major McLaughlin made the statement attributed to him, we feel he should be invited before one of the classes in the public schools to make the demonstration.

We are gratified the board of education has taken the stand it has. It will simply result in throwing the responsibility upon the board of trustees. If the levy that has been made will be permitted to stand it will be impossible to make any repairs to the school properties, and when the money will be exhausted, the public schools must, unquestionably, be closed. This is a matter we especially direct to the parents and the school pupils in this city, that it may be understood the fault does not lie with the board of education.

Since writing the above another meeting of the board of education has been held, at which legal advice was received, and it was determined to immediately institute legal proceedings. It is a question that will have to be met sooner or later, and the sooner determined the better, whether the board of education is a mere figurehead, and whether the laws mean what, in plain English, they say. If it is conceded the trustees have the arbitrary right to fix the school-tax rate at any figure they choose, regardless of the judgment of the men the people have chosen especially to look after the schools, ignorant or designing trustees could so cut down the rate that the school department would be absolutely paralyzed.

It has been the plaint of every century from the earliest history of the world, that the vice and immorality exceeded all prior times. The great Latin satirist and poet, Juvenal, in his day wrote that "there is nothing further that future times can add to our immorality; our posterity must have the same desires and perpetuate the same acts. Every vice has reached its climax.

"Nothing is left—nothing, for future times
To add to the full catalogue of crimes.
The baffled sons must feel the same desires,
And act the same follies, as their sires.
Vice has attained its zenith."

The gifted satirist of the classical age painted in glowing colors the hypocrisy and the vices of pretended philosophers of his time; but, like the alleged casuist of to-day, he was inclined to look on the dark side of life. There are those who always deplore the present, and, with a sigh, refer to the "good old times." It is not wise to make our models from any age that has past. At no period of the world have the people been better or wiser or happier than at present. The peasant and the laborer is the peer of the richest and most-favored. He has the same rights as well as conveniences of the rich. There has never been an age when morality was superior to ours. We have just read an elegant lecture by the Rev. Jos. Kraukopf on "To-day Better than Yesterday," and agree with the following sentiments therein expressed: Look at our age from whatever standpoint we may, compare it with what former age we please, we fail to discover a reason anywhere to justify the ushering in of the present year with a week of wailing and lamentation over the degeneracy of our time. Far more rationally acted they who parted from the old year with thanksgiving on their lips, and greeted the new with welcome smiles. Away with tears! Away with fears! We are not degenerating. We are fast striding forwards, onwards, upwards. We are the heirs of all the good of all the past, and are adding to it much good of our own. We are shedding the brute and are donning the garb of the God like. The Golden Age is before and not behind us. "What's past is the prologue" of the glorious scene the future shall enact. Each year adds its portion, each day its mite. To-day is better than yesterday.

Ambrose Bierce.

Allan Forman, editor and publisher of the Journalist, a periodical published in New York in the interest of newspapers, authors, and publishers, gives the following pen sketch of Mr. Bierce, in his issue of January 30:

No one appreciates Mr. Bierce's ability nor admires his genius more sincerely than I do. He is without doubt the most able—and vulgar—writer in American journalism. Were he less brilliant his vulgarity would be unbearable; were he less vulgar he would be the greatest newspaper writer of our generation. As he is, he is a disappointed, soured old man, a journalistic Ishmaelite with few genuine friends, an army of admirers, and a record of consistent failure—failure brought about by his own unwillingness to be a gentleman. He is drawing a paltry hundred dollars a week from the Examiner, when, with his genius, he should be making ten times that amount. A man with a most varied and vigorous vocabulary, a most graceful style and the broadest knowledge, a true poet, a wonderful writer of short stories, a novelist of great originality, is working for a pittance, in comparison to what he should be earning. Why? Because he is an ingrained and hopeless cad. It is a strange combination, and one which should rouse pity rather than anger. It is a curious twist in his mentality which impels him to ruin much of his work by his loafing, and it has kept his reputation—which should be world-wide—confined to a few newspaper men and readers on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Bierce has had an interesting history. He began in San Francisco as a porter in the mint, and while still serving the government in that capacity he wrote paragraphs for the News Letter. After he had obtained a foothold on that paper he threw up his position in the mint, and for two or three years he conducted the "Town Crier" page of the News Letter. At that time Mr. Bierce did some of the most brilliant work of his life. It attracted the attention of the editor of London Fun, and he was invited to go to London to take charge of a paper called the Tommyhawk. He made an exceptionally brilliant paper for a time, and then his employers were obliged to discharge him for blasphemy and eroticism. From London he came to New York with a letter to Ballard Smith, who was then managing editor of the Sun, and Mr. Smith gladly gave him a position on the staff of that paper, but his blasphemy and vulgarity drove him from the Sun. He then went to J. Gilmer Speed, of the World, where he was given first-class assignments which he was unable to fulfil. While in New York he suffered the pangs of hunger a good many times, if my information is correct, and finally he managed to get back to San Francisco, where he was employed by Fred. Somers on the Argonaut. He lent brilliancy and snap to the columns of that best of weekly papers for some time, but marred his only creditable record by a series of vicious and unprovoked attacks upon San Francisco newspaper men. His victims were selected from the men who were not in a position to hit back even had they had the mental ability to cope with Bierce. He made an especial attack upon one Joe Erwin, a hard-working man of mediocre talent, who supported a mother and two sisters on a salary of twenty-five dollars a week. By persistent attacks he succeeded in having the poor fellow's salary reduced to twenty dollars a week. That was the triumph of Mr. Bierce's life.

He kept on attacking newspaper men who could not hit back until he was finally turned down by Arthur McEwen, who published in the Mail an article on Bierce, entitled "Me," to which Bierce never dared reply. Physically, Bierce is as great a coward as he is with his pen. He always selects a victim whom he regards as "safe." If, however, he is mistaken and is threatened with a thrashing, he goes into hiding until the storm blows over. His self-conceit is so abnormal as to be grotesque, a fact which made Mr. McEwen's article especially apropos and galling. On one occasion, while he was on the staff of the News Letter, he attacked a citizen of San Francisco, who started out after him with a gun. For three weeks Bierce could not be found; finally he was discovered, hidden in a little room in a big warehouse building, from which he ventured only at night to purchase supplies. Instances of his wanton malice and cowardice could be cited without number. Yet withal he is, I am told, a most interesting companion, a brilliant conversationalist, and the possessor of many admirable social qualities. It is pitiful that a man who might easily be truly great should make so ill a use of the talents with which he is endowed. As an undoubted genius, a brilliant writer, a man of powerful imagination and wonderful ability, I admire and respect him. As a cad, a coward and a liar, I have given him all the advertising he will get from the Journalist. The next time his name is mentioned in this paper will be when occasion demands the printing of his obituary.

"Is the use of wine decreasing at dinners?" is the subject of a number of interesting opinions from many men distinguished in social life, and which appear in the January number of the Ladies' Home Journal. Chauncey M. Depew expresses his views as follows: The use of wine at dinner has been decreasing for several years. In the novels and autobiographies of fifty and one hundred years ago, "one bottle," "two bottles," and "three bottles" men formed a feature of the description of the society of the period. They did not take light wines either, but solid sherries, ports, and Madeiras. We learn that it was common at those entertainments for a number of the guests to be hopelessly intoxicated. The fact that the diner-out was apt to get in this condition did not impair his popularity, or his standing among his friends. One may dine now every night in the year and never meet with a tipsy person. It is because we drink very much lighter wines, and less of them. Within the last ten years a great change has come over dinners in the number and variety of wines served. This is especially the case in the United States and in England. Formerly there was a procession of wines, one with each course. Anyone who went through such a dinner, after astonishing his digestion with white wines and sherry, with claret, champagne, Burgundy, Madeira, brandy and liqueurs, became an early subject for Carlsbad waters and a premature grave. I have noticed in London in the last two seasons that at the English dinner they now go almost to the other extreme, serving claret and champagne, according to the preferences of the guests for one or the other, through the whole meal. We have not come exactly to that yet, but at a New York dinner, while you still find several varieties of wine, champagne is the one which is served mainly through the entire evening. The amount of wine which is consumed per head is constantly diminishing at all dinners, and the number of men who abstain altogether is decidedly on the increase. The sparkling mineral water is largely performing the functions formerly filled by the stronger beverages. An infrequent diner-out is much more apt to indulge unduly in both food and drink than a veteran. When one's social obligations compel him to appear in evening dress at his own house or some one's else every night, he finds that to have a clear head and sound stomach for the business of the next day he must practice self-denial and temperance. We are all creatures of habit, and self-denial can become as much of a habit as over-indulgence. As the cares of business become more exacting, and the pace in life more rapid, we pay greater attention to the loss of health. We find not only longevity but comfort in avoiding those things which impair or unduly excite our organism. Thus, while our temptations increase we become more temperate. As matters are now progressing in the social world, the next generation will be found dieting under medical directions. They will be enjoying better health, doing a larger amount of work and enduring a greater social strain in a festive way, and having a better time than their fathers did.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

It is interesting to observe how much easier it is for a man to behave like an actor off the stage than on it.

Miss Genevieve Ward, at last accounts, was filling a successful theatrical engagement at Cape Town, Africa.

A "razzle dazzle" was one of the nuisances specified in the complaint against a place of amusement in the old Cross Bones burial yard, near London. The "razzle dazzle" was a contrivance intended to make people experience the motion of the waves of the sea, and the screams of the razzle dazzlers were heard for blocks.

Modjeska is one of the most scholarly women of the stage. Besides being a tireless student of Shakespeare, she is a constant reader of his great contemporaries, and she has made and is still making a large collection of Elizabethan works. Besides all this, she speaks half a dozen languages, including some of the difficult tongues of eastern Europe.

Eugenie Blair, the actress, makes all her costumes. She buys the best crepe and usually takes ten yards for each dress. She cuts it in two pieces and sews down the center, and is able to make any manner of dress without the aid of pins, needles, thread, or sewing machine. She drapes the goods to suit her figure, and whenever fastening is needed she ties with a piece of tape of the same shade as the dress.

The late Alfred Collier, who died just before The Mountebanks, his first Gilbertian opera, was produced, had a remarkable experience with a song he wrote and sold for a few pounds. It was the song that was considered the greatest hit in the opera of Dorothy—which was sung a few weeks ago by the Boston Ideals in Detroit—and it was said at the time that Collier didn't write it. As a matter of fact, he had disposed of this same "Queen of My Heart" years before for a trifle, and had tried unsuccessfully to get a royalty on it. More than 40,000 copies had been sold, but it was another's property when the public heard it in Collier's opera of Dorothy.

The modern playwright who has suffered at the hands of the critics may gather some consolation from reading the pen-lashings which fell to the share of Oliver Goldsmith on the production of She Stoops to Conquer. One of these learned gentlemen says: "The drift tends to no moral, no edification of any kind—the situations, however, are well imagined, and make one laugh in spite of the grossness of the dialogue, the forced witticisms and total improbability of the whole plan and conduct. But what disgusts me most is that though the characters are very gross and aim at low humor, not one of them says a sentence that is natural or marks any character at all."

In speaking of arrests for playing on Sunday, an eastern paper says: The number of theatrical people who have been arrested in Cincinnati during the past few years runs up into many thousands. The sou-brettes, song and dance men, leading lovers, pretty opera singers and all, regard being arrested in Cincinnati as quite a necessary and not very disagreeable part of the business. The manager is notified before the performance as to the number of people the police desire to arrest after a Sunday performance. He picks out the requisite number and sends them in carriages to the police station, where they are registered and released to appear in the morning. At their own convenience they appear in police court next day, sign a bail bond and that is the end of it. When the actors first began giving their regular Monday performances before the police justices it created a good deal of amusement for the newspapers, but now it is such a matter-of-fact bit of routine that even the fanciful, faking police reporter, who always has his eye open for a pretty face in trouble, does not notice them.

A lesson of good breeding was administered by the Parisian diva of cafe concert fame, Mlle. De Dio, to several of the most high-born members of the jeunesse doree of Vienna. It seems that the other day a number of cavalry officers coolly addressed a request to the songstress to take supper with them after the performance, without having been presented to her beforehand. Mlle. De Dio replied: "I am not in the habit of taking my meals with persons whom I do not know. However, since it seems that my presence at the supper will give you pleasure, I shall come." The supper was prepared in a dining-room at Sacher's famous restaurant, and the most delicate viands were washed down by wines worth their weight in gold. Almost immediately after the dessert Mlle. De Dio complained that she had a violent headache and withdrew, leaving the men to continue drinking champagne for some time longer. At length it was determined that the hour had come for breaking up the party and the head waiter was called to bring in the bill. "There is nothing to pay," replied the man, "Mlle. De Dio settled the bill before leaving."

Twenty million copies of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern," have been sold since 1872.

There are said to be 18,000 newspaper women in London, who have 22 press clubs and authors' societies among them.

"Cheer up, friend," said the parson to the dying editor, "you have a bright future before you." "That's what's bothering me," gasped the editor; "I can see it blazing."

J. M. Barrie, the author of the "Little Minister," is the new light in literature, and yet he is yet a very young man. He has ideas and he has the genius of style. Ideas and style in letters make the author immortal.

Alexander Dumas called his country house after the most famous of his novels, and never was so happy as when he had left Paris for "Monte Cristo." With a like fondness for his books, M. de Maupassant found his chief pleasure in visiting the ports on the Riviera in his yacht "Bel Ami."

Churton Collins is rather late in accusing Tennyson of plagiarism, but he has set certain circles in England agog over the energetic manner he has gone about it, naming in the laureate's poems many passages which he declares were taken bodily from Virgil, Lucretius and Theocritus, together with phrases from the early English poets.

The largest library in the world is that at Paris, which contains upwards of 2,000,000 printed books and 160,000 manuscripts. Between the imperial library at St. Petersburg and the British museum there is not much difference. In the British museum there are about 1,500,000 volumes. The royal library at Munich has something over 900,000, but this includes many pamphlets.

Owen Meredith's (Lord Lytton's) coffin was borne to the grave without a blossom to decorate its pall, according to the direction of Lady Lytton, who said that her husband had requested that not so much "as the tiniest violet or the smallest rosebud" should be used about his bier. "What in heaven's name have poor flowers done to be condemned to serve such a horrid purpose as being consigned to vaults and graves? I like a sad-looking funeral," was a frequent saying of the poet; and his funeral ceremony was, indeed, a gloomy one.

Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the great humorist, was always in sore straits for ready cash, and his money troubles at length had come to such a pass that his creditors lost patience, and sent a sheriff's officer to arrest him. Happily for poor Sheridan he chanced to be away from home when this ominous caller "dropped in"; and his house-maid, guessing the visitor's errand from his appearance (for in those days the dreaded "bailiffs" were known to every child by their glaring red waistcoats), took care to be profoundly ignorant as to when her master might be expected back. But when the latter came home next morning the girl, not liking to hurt his feelings by saying plainly that a sheriff's officer had come to seize him, put the case thus: "Please, sir, there was a gen'l'man called while you was away as was rather in a red weskit than otherwise."

Eugene Field, in speaking of the comparison between congressman Boutelle's and Proctor Knott's speeches, says: The comparison becomes all the more absurd when we remember that Proctor Knott's "pungent Duluth speech" was an atrociously high-handed plagiarism; it was pirated by the yard from the columns of a Missouri weekly newspaper, and when confronted with the proofs of his dishonesty Knott had the ineffable gall to explain that he would not have used the newspaper article if he had supposed it was going to make so greta a stir. Had Knott been a great man he would never have stooped to that plagiarism; had he not been a weak man he would have made public acknowledgment of his indebtedness to that Missouri editor for the means whereby mediocrity rose suddenly into fame. Never before had Knott said a bright thing, and never after did he say a bright thing. He prospered solely upon an act of audacious piracy, pungent truly, but a piracy for all that—unscrupulous and detestable.

One of the necessities of jurisprudence is—prudence.

The confidence man who swindles clergymen may be called a "shepherd's crook."

Some men are born statesmen, some men acquire statesmanship, and others secure their political bearings from the misfit establishments.

There is a marked predominance of lawyers in congress, there being as many as 212 members who have practiced law in one form or another.

There are twenty-one law firms in the union composed of husbands and wives, and about 200 women who practice law in the courts or manage legal publications.

The reason we like to see our preacher hit from the shoulder is because we imagine he is hitting at the fellow in the next pew, and that fellow thinks the shot is at some other fellow, and so we all like to see evil handled without gloves.

A Japanese doctor never dreams of asking a poor patient for a fee. There is a proverb among the medical fraternity of Japan: "When the twin enemies poverty and disease invade a home, then he who takes aught from that home, even though it be given him, is a robber."

From many selections from Marcus Aurelius we choose this, as showing his keen insight into this weak human nature of ours, "I have often wondered how it is that every man loves himself more than all the rest of men, but yet sets less value on his own opinion of himself than on the opinion of others."

Judge Abraham Jefferson Seay, the new governor of Oklahoma, was not a precocious youth, it is interesting to learn. In fact, when he was twenty-one he could barely read and write. But at thirty-two he was a lawyer of some standing, next a county attorney, and for twelve years thereafter he sat on the bench as a circuit judge.

Drastic questions are, of course, sometimes necessary, as in the case of the Highland witness called by his chief. "Well, Donald, how did you get on?" was asked of him when he left the court. "Heaven knows; my wits are not just settled yet! I was going through the story my own way when an awful man that sits in the middle (counselor Haddington) broke in upon me and put such questions that I fear I've told the truth." But severity is not irrelevance. A witness speaking for his daughter, who had been shamefully used by the prisoner, was thus cross-examined: "Pray, sir, is this young lady your daughter?" "She is." "How do you know she is your daughter?" "Gentlemen of the jury," said the witness, "you hear the question that blackguard has put to me. Will you believe him or me?" and they made a very proper choice.

James Payn, the clever English writer, makes some strong and pertinent comments on the modern "cross-examination" of witnesses. The confidence of the bar has at last been shaken in the virtues of cross-examinations; that of the public it never possessed. The license of counsel has, we felt, long been carried beyond all decent bounds, and if, as has lately been made manifest, no certain benefit is derived from it, the sooner it is put a stop to the better. This must be done from outside, for bench and bar are but one vast trades union, the members of which play into one another's hands. It is no use for an honest witness to appeal for protection to the judge; a rabbit in torments might as well appeal to the college of surgeons against his vivisector. Cross-examination, as practiced at present, works very like the old passport system. It is of little use in the restraint of crime, because the habitual evildoer is more or less prepared for it, and is quite unscrupulous in his mode of defense; but it is most cruel and distressing to the nervous and the innocent, who are unaccustomed to it. There are no more amazing deliverances than the indignant comments we sometimes hear from the bench upon the absence of this or that person from the witness-box whose sense of what was owing to the public should have insured his attendance. The gentleman has probably had some sense of what is owing to himself, and very wisely removed himself out of the reach of a subpoena. In a law case those members of the dramatis personæ who appear gratuitously, or from a feeling of public duty, are the only ones who are habitually subjected to impertinence and insult. If the bar declines to reform itself, we must look for some honest and courageous witness who will refuse to answer all impertinent questions, be committed by the judge for contempt of court, and then appeal to public opinion, which will be very ready to stand by him. No one who knows what everybody outside the inns of court, and not a few within them, is saying, can doubt the issue.

An exchange remarks: "The cultivation of the licorice plant has been suggested for southern California. It thrives best in a rich, sandy loam, requires but little cultivation, and the manner of procuring the extract is simple." The licorice plant has been successfully cultivated in Sacramento county for many years, and we are surprised its cultivation has not extended to other parts of the state.

Sacramento is behind the times in that she does not copyright or patent her pronounced curiosities. It seems now that in Oakland the secret political organization known as the Citizens' Municipal League has adopted resolutions in opposition to the issuance of bonds for the construction of Peralta Park and Lake Merritt boulevard contained in the ordinances of the city council now being published. We would much like to know who the Sacramento missionary is who visited Oakland. Certainly the Athens of the Pacific could not have originated so sublime a farce as this seems to be. If we mistake not the good sense of the people of Oakland—situated as they are upon a commodious bay—the next thing we will hear an outraged public will further pollute the waters of the bay; add to it other useless rubbish—the secret citizens' municipal league.

One of the dying requests of Nicholas of Russia, who was heir apparent to the throne, was that his younger brother, Alexander, who is now Czar, should marry the Princess Dagmar, to whom Nicholas was engaged. The young prince carried out the request, and on succeeding his brother as heir to the throne, he speedily became betrothed to the beautiful princess. If Prince George of England should marry the fiancée of his dead brother, the case would, therefore, not be without a precedent. The general voice of England has pronounced the Princess May a suitable woman to be their future queen, and Prince George might go further and fare worse.

The death is announced of "Old Jack Stewart," at San Diego, on Tuesday, at the age of 81. Stewart came to the coast as a pilot in the Boston ship Alert in 1832, and was a shipmate of the late Richard Henry Dana. The description of the voyage is the subject of Dana's famous book "Two Years before the Mast." Another very old-timer passed away this week in San Francisco—Jacob Primer Leese, who came to the coast in the early thirties, and built the first house in what is now San Francisco. Leese married a sister of the late General M. G. Vallejo, and with Vallejo was made a prisoner by the Bear-flag party, and was confined in Sutter's fort.

Always somebody else to blame. That trait of character—or lack of character—would seem to have descended legitimately from Adam, who said: "The woman tempted me, and I did eat," when called to account by the Creator for disobeying His commands. An actor in New York who attempted suicide left a scribbled note saying: "Don't blame me for doing it, as it was not my fault. Bad company and gambling was the cause of it, and may be a lesson to other young men." His deductions and moralizing are as faulty as is his grammar. Not his fault, indeed! Whose was it, then? Was it not his fault that he went into bad company, and indulged in gambling? "Conscience" not only "doth make cowards of us all," but liars as well. When David said "All men are liars," he must have been fresh from the contemplation of such a fellow as this. When a man holds himself to strict accountability he will be a great deal nearer right than when he blames some one else for his own sins.

The last census bulletin relating to paupers in almshouses, shows: The average age of an almshouse pauper in the United States is 51 years, which is 6 years more than it was 10 years ago. The number of male paupers under 30 years of age and of female paupers under 40 years of age is actually less than the numbers returned in the census of 1880. Relatively to the total population it must be very much less. In spite of the persistent efforts constantly made to get children out of almshouses, the number in these establishments who were under 10 years old is 4,338. In 1880 it was 6,902. Children constitute a much larger percentage of the total almshouse population in the southern than in the northern states. In the far west one-half of all the almshouse paupers are between 60 and 80 years of age. From 20 to 50 years the number of female paupers exceeds that of males. At all other ages the number of male paupers is in excess, except after passing 100 years. The figures for ages over 100 years are not trustworthy. The ratio of male to female paupers is, on the whole, slightly greater than it was 10 years ago. The excess of females in the middle decades of life is decidedly less marked than then.

The Folsom Telegraph has reached the age of 36 years. It is among the oldest established papers in the state. Recurring to memory our recollection of the history of Folsom's journal shows a number of changes. In 1855 the Granite Journal was founded by L. Bradley, and at one time Samuel Seabough was its editor. The Journal passed away, and from its plant came Tom Mooney's Express. Mooney was an alleged reformer and historian. With the Express he commenced a history of Ireland. After a couple of years' experience the Express vanished, and Geo. E. Wellington, at the time a classmate of the writer at the Folsom institute, then a flourishing institution of learning, took charge of the paper, changed the name to the Dispatch. Several years after it came into the hands of P. J. Hopper, when the present title, the Telegraph, was given it. Two years ago Thad. J. McFarland succeeded to the sole proprietorship of the Telegraph, and has by his industry and foresight made the Telegraph one of the best interior papers in the state. His devotion to the local interests merits and undoubtedly receives due recognition by the people of Folsom and surrounding country. In the early history of the Telegraph one of the editors of THEMIS was for a period in charge of the editorial pages, and inflicted a patient public with many of his crude and boyish efforts at journalism.

Home Days With Father.

Friday evening was always the brightest and happiest of the whole week at Chappaqua, for that was sure to bring my dear father home. The whole house was alive with happy preparation. The very pine trees pointed tiny little fingers down the wild woody road to show the way he was coming. How eagerly I remember watching a certain little pink gingham frock being ironed in which I was to go and meet him. I used to sit between two patriarchal oak trees till in the distance the familiar figure was seen, slightly bent forward, his arms loaded with good things, entering the gate; and then I would fly to meet him. How my little arm used to try to crook itself up and take as much of his load as it could, and how somehow the burden was always lifted just a little higher, so my help was only an empty form. We used often on these walks to talk of a wonderful pony that he was looking for, and which arrived, sleek and round, and mischievous, one birthday morning.

The first thing when we reached the house was to seek mother's room where the dear inmate for years struggled with a terrible cough. From there, carried in triumph on his back, I would ride down to dinner. After dinner, sitting around the table, he would call for Dana's book of poetry, and read to us many of his favorites. I look now at the familiar lines and smile to think how incomprehensible it must have been to my childish mind, and yet I loved the reading, and thought, like the wise men of to-day, I "knew it all." I used frequently to pipe up at those happy times "Papa, please tell us a 'nanydote.'" One of the anecdotes still remains in my mind; of a certain sea captain who travelling for his company used to bring in very long bills. One of the charges they especially objected to was three pounds for "a cocked hat" to be worn on a visit to an Indian prince. The next time the accounts were more wisely itemized, and they expressed themselves as perfectly satisfied "Ah," he said, with a twinkle in his eye, "the cocked hat's there, but you don't see it."

At one of the home gatherings some one, fearing I was being petted too much, said: "Mr. Greeley, don't flatter the child."

"But," I answered in his defense, "Pussy just loves flattery," and if gentleness and a great loving heart injures anyone he would have given me some excuse for being spoiled.

I remember one incident of his indulgence. One day he brought home an umbrella with a wooden dog's head as a handle. My covetous little heart proceeded to set itself upon that canine effigy. In vain papa offered me a whole dog. But I pleaded that no other head in the world would be like that head, and the result was he sawed it off and went back to town with a handleless umbrella.

I cannot recall my father speaking a single harsh or unkind word to either my dear sister or myself, but I can recall to day an occasion in which I longed to give myself a good shaking. Papa was engrossed in his paper, and no word or inquiry of mine could rouse him. So, to get his attention at any price, I began tearing away little bits of his newspaper. I must have reached at length the article he was reading, for, gently rising, he lifted me by my arms (for my legs I made instantly limp) and so deposited me outside his locked door without a word. Howls of indignation from me brought anxious inquiries from a relative, but he made no explanation; neither did I. My humiliation was too great at being ignored.

The faces of people are children's books, from which they read searchingly. Scanning earnestly his dear face, so full of the sunshine of purity, so bright with humor and wisdom, a deep impression, never to be effaced, was made upon me at the terrible sorrow I saw written there when he came home and told us of Abraham Lincoln's assassination. Never again did I see that look till the one he loved to call "Mother" passed away. Then it settled down with a grief from which he never roused himself. I never could trace any signs of disappointment at the presidential campaign going against him, but rather a quiet and humorous philosophy. I think his main regret would have been for those faithful friends who had followed a lost cause. The Saturday before my mother's death he walked with me to Saint Mary's school, where he had placed me a few days before. Little did I think, as he left me at the door, we should meet on Monday at the side of that dear mother from whose face death had smoothed the cares and sufferings of years. From that time he could not sleep, and he seemed not to care to eat. The mainspring of his home had broken. The one who, though sick unto death for years, had been such a force and strength at home, holding up the noblest and highest examples to her children, teaching us that truth must be followed at any cost, yet reaching down in womanly tenderness to the smallest animal, or going out in the snow, though sick herself, to protect some poor drunken man whom the boys were pelting, telling me never to laugh at such a one, for they were suffering from a terrible disease; yes, the look that he had worn when Lincoln was killed came back to stay. The heart that could love and work for others could break when the highly-strung chords were strained too far. I have had to listen to long explanations about his disappointed ambition. To die or live for the good of his laboring brothers and sisters was the only ambition I could ever discover in that great, loving heart. He had no tears to shed at his wife's funeral. But as he turned away from the simple plot at Greenwood he said: "That vault will be opened for me in less than a month." And it was not the first of his prophecies to be sadly fulfilled.

Years afterward a social man told me how one evening, near midnight, when Delmonico's was filled with gay pleasure seekers, he caught sight for one moment, in the light which streamed across the pavement from the doorway, of an old man in a white coat carrying the baskets of two little ragged girls, evidently taking them to a place of shelter from the storm. So do I love to picture him again. The world of the prosperous and thoughtless were little affected by his life, but as he faded into the darkness of the night of oblivion, I like to think of him as one who desired even to bring the homeless and the wretched to shelter, and to carry their burdens for them.—Mrs. Clendenin (Daughter of the late Horace Greeley) in Ladies' Home Journal.

Absurd Beliefs About Our Satellite.

Farmers used to put a great deal of dependence on the moon. They planted crops, built worm fences, put on shingle and clapboard roofs, killed hogs, hung meat, cut timber, chopped weeds, and traded horses according to its phases.

Almost any old-time farmer will tell you that a worm fence built in the light of the moon and ascending node will worm around and finally fall down. If you plant potatoes during similar phases they will all go to tops and the tubers will be small and watery. This is the time, however, to plant cucumbers, especially when the sign is in the arms.

The carpenter of former times would not think of putting a shaved shingle roof on a building in the dark of the moon, because the shingles would curl up, pull the nails out and soon leak like a sieve. Neither would he cut timber for a house, nor would he paint it until the sign was right.

Your grandmother or veteran aunt can tell you that when hogs were killed in the wrong time of the moon the slices of ham would shrivel up more than half, and flitch would all fry away, leaving only small cracklings. Apples or any kind of fruit dried in the wrong time were certain to mould or get wormy, and cider vinegar refuse to become sharp.

It was to the moon that the farmer looked for indications of the weather. If the new moon lay well on its back it was a sign of dry weather, but if it tipped up to such an extent that a shot pouch wouldn't hang on its lower horn, you might depend upon the water's pouring out.

The time of changing had a good deal to do with the weather, but there was a lack of agreement upon this point. It was generally conceded, however, that a change before noon, or before midnight, indicated fair weather. A circle or halo around the moon was a sure sign of rain, and the number of stars visible within the circuit indicated the number of days before the rain would come.

The health, growth, and development of children and animals were supposed to be influenced by the moon. If the sign was right at the time of birth they would be well formed and intellectual, but if it was wrong there was no telling what sort of creatures they would become.—American Notes and Queries.

What Is a Well-Bred Woman?

A well-bred woman never dresses so that she attracts attention on the street.

A well-bred woman never talks about her personal affairs in public places.

A well-bred woman doesn't let the door slam in the face of the next comer.

A well-bred woman doesn't drop first her purse, and then her handkerchief, and then her gloves, and then her flower in a public restaurant until everybody is looking at her.

A well-bred woman doesn't read her morning mail in a street car.

A well-bred woman doesn't tell the name of any celebrity she may have met when she was traveling.

A well-bred woman is quiet and refined; a man is proud to be seen with her, and he can pick her out from a thousand, which is very much more than the average woman can do.

Isn't that so?

A Leap-Year Idyl.

"Be mine," she cried dramatically, as she sank on one knee before him. "I have long loved you, and now I can resist no longer—I must know my fate. Sweet creature, say the word that will make me the happiest of women."

"I don't want to be married," he answered, coyly; "Ma says I'm too young and couldn't take care of a wife. Take some one of your own size. Let go of me. I do not want to be kissed."

"Oh, you great big nunny," she said, banging the furniture. "I was only rehearsing for a leap year party. I wouldn't have you if you were worth your weight in gold." And she bounced off in a huff.—Detroit Free Press.

What to Teach a Daughter.

Teach her that not only must she love her father and mother, but honor them in word and deed.

That work is worthy always when it is well done.

That the value of money is just the good it will do in life, but that she ought to know and appreciate this value.

That the man who wishes to marry her is the one who tells her so, and is willing to work for her, and not the one who whispers silly love speeches and forgets that men cease to be men when they have no object in life.

That her best confidant is always her mother, and that no one sympathizes with her in her pleasures and joys as you do.

That unless she shows courtesy to others she need never expect it from them, and that the best answer to rudeness is being blind to it.

That when God made her body He intended that it should be clothed properly and modestly, and when she neglects herself she is insulting Him who made her.

Teach her to think well before she says no or yes, but to mean it when she does.

Teach her to avoid men who speak lightly of any of the great duties of life, who show in their appearance that their habits are bad.

Teach her that her own room is her nest, and that to make it sweet and attractive is a duty as well as a pleasure.

Teach her that if she can sing or read or draw, or give pleasure in any way by her accomplishments, she is selfish and unkind if she does not do this gladly.

Teach her to be a woman—self-respecting, honest, loving and kind—and then you will have a daughter who will be a pleasure to you always, and whose days will be long and joyous in the land which the Lord hath given her.

Imagination of Children at Night.

A word, a sound, a shadow will start a child's imagination into wild activity. Unreasoning fears will run riot in him; a host of dismal possibilities will suggest themselves, and we only who can remember back into the days of our infancy can sympathize with those uncontrollable terrors which make it a crueler punishment to some children to be left alone in the dark than the infliction of any bodily punishment could be. Their cry, like Goethe's, when his last night gloomed upon him, is for light. And from what untold miseries would a night lamp save them! In a story we read long years ago an infant was represented as thus crying for the light. His mother responding to the call, a philosophical discussion ensued between her and her little one; and by a series of artful questions she entrapped him into the acknowledgment that the candle he craved was nothing but wax and cotton. "And how can wax and cotton help you?" was, if we remember right, her triumphant conclusion as she left him, if not reconciled to the darkness, yet beguiled by the sophistry into delusive submission. We doubt not, however, that presently he was quaking again with all his former fears, which, perhaps, were no worse, after all, than the spurious comfort he had been subjected to.—Argosy.

Manner is one of the principal external graces of character. It is the ornament of action, and often makes the commonest offices beautiful by the way in which it performs them. It is a happy way of doing things, adorning even the smallest details of life.

Quinine cost $20 per ounce in 1823, and $3 in 1853; $3 70 in 1878; while now it costs from 18½ to 24 cents.

The Lawyer's Ghost.

A lawyer and a bishop (perhaps the bishop should come first) were talking, and this was the manner of their talk:

"I have become thoroughly convinced," said the lawyer, "of the existence of nocturnal apparitions, for I have seen one!"

"Dear me!" exclaimed the bishop, "I am very curious; relate the story."

"I will, my lord, I will," said the lawyer. "It was between the hours of 11 and 12. I had gone to bed and was just falling into my first comfortable sleep, when I was awakened by a strange creaking noise. It sounded as if someone was walking up stairs! The steps sounded nearer and nearer, slower and slower; solemn and measured they were, and presently they halted at my door. I drew the sheet over my head and lay there trembling, not daring to move."

"Something," continued the lawyer, "entered my room, and threw the sheet over my face. I felt rather than saw a faint, yellow, glimmering light. I could not move at first, but I presently managed to gain a little courage. I drew the sheet cautiously down from my face, and—looked!"

"Well!" cried the bishop, excitedly.

"In the center of the room," said the lawyer, slowly, "stood a tall old man. He seemed gaunt and worn with age or hunger, and his long gray beard hung half way down his breast. He was dressed in a queer loose cloak with a cape, and he wore a broad leather band about his waist. In one hand he held a peculiarly-shaped lantern from which flowed the yellow light, making strange, ghostly shadows on the wall behind him. In the other hand he held a staff, the look of which was unpleasant. He stood still in the middle of the floor, looking at me. Presently I said, 'Whence art thou? what dost thou require?'"

"And what did he say?" cried the bishop, fixing his eyes upon the odd expression of the lawyer's face.

"He said"—replied the lawyer, speaking in a hoarse whisper—"he said: 'I beg y'r pardon, sur. I'm the watchman of the street, sur; an' I thought 'twould be best for me, sur, to come up an' tell yer that yer front door stood open! If ye do be lavin' it that way, sur, it's bad luck ve'll have before the monin'!'"—Harpers' Young People.

Combating a Superstition.

Thirteen Philadelphia young men have banded themselves together, if rumors are true, in what timid superstitious ones will call a suicide club. This Club of Thirteen, as its name bears hint, has been organized in contempt of almost all known popular superstitions. The club meetings occur Friday evenings, and the 13th of the month, in room 13 of a house numbered 13. The fiery-haired member is the first to enter the hall, and all pass under a ladder raised in the room. On taking his seat, the president opens an umbrella handed him by the cross-eyed janitor and sits under it during the session. The sergeant-at-arms opens the proceedings by breaking a looking-glass. A skeleton sits opposite the president at all feasts, and two black cats stalk around the room. The walls are adorned with peacock feathers. Every member is under oath always to spill salt, look at the moon over his left shoulder, stumble whenever alighting from a journey, walk between couples on the street, and when together pass on either side of a post. They are eager just now to purchase a raven and rent a haunted house to hold their meeting in.—Philadelphia Record.

The Bankruptcy Bill.

The work of impressing the merits of the Torrey bankruptcy bill upon the new congress has already begun, and the prospect of success at the present session is regarded by its friends as promising. The general system of the bill unquestionably gains strength with discussion, and it is now accepted by a greater number and variety of representative commercial bodies than have indorsed any previous bill. Indeed, there is practically no organized opposition to it, and what little disposition there was at one time toward partisan prejudice has vanished under the candid and intelligent advocacy of the measure. The unfavorable feeling in the south no longer exists, as is indicated by the fact that Judge George W. Stone, for many years chief justice of the Alabama supreme court, came to Washington expressly to urge the subject on the attention of President Harrison. Judge Stone, in a recent interview, declared his opinion that the Torrey bill was the best plan of bankruptcy legislation yet proposed, and that its passage would be especially advantageous to the growing interests of the south.

Ruined.

The morning's sunlight streamed in through the window, and the clock struck the hour of 7, but the sleeper never opened his eyes.

A pale-faced woman, middle-aged, but youthful-looking, entered the room and stood gazing upon the face of her husband.

"John sleeps late," she said, in a low tone, "and he is dreaming again."

Just then the sleeper's features wore a singular expression, and the man started nervously in his disturbed slumber.

"A bad dream," remarked the watcher, "but he must have it out. He needs his sleep."

Quietly and cautiously, the woman left the room and nothing was heard but the ticking of the clock.

The sunlight reached out and played over the face of the dreamer—a thin, careworn face, with brown locks sprinkled with gray clustering around it.

It was half-past 7 when the man opened his eyes. He was wide awake, and he was evidently in no mood to try another nap.

He was dressed in five minutes. Outside of his garments he hurriedly drew on a workman's blue overalls, and then he paused a moment.

"My dream was the truth," he muttered. "The same thing three times in one night must mean something. It is a warning and I must heed it. When the work is done Mary shall know all about it. But not now—she might attempt to turn me from my purpose."

He slipped into the hall and listened. His wife was in another part of the house, and no one saw him.

The man in the blue overalls went out of the back door and walked swiftly down to his little workshop in one corner of the yard. He shut himself in and locked the door.

For the next half hour there was an indescribable clatter in the little workshop. Pedestrians on their way down town stopped to listen. Some laughed and went on their way, but a mechanic on his way to his work shook his head.

"Mr. Hale is not at work," he said. "That noise sounds like an ax. He is just the man to go crazy and smash his wonderful models. He's no common inventor. Money is only so much dirt in his eyes!"

And the carpenter walked off, saying something about "high-toned cranks."

It was a little after 8 o'clock when John Hale sat down to breakfast. He had thrown aside his working suit and had made his toilet with some care.

"Why, John!" exclaimed his wife. "I thought you had gone to work!"

"I have finished it, my dear," replied the husband, with a smile, "and it is the best day's work that I have ever done."

"But I don't understand," said Mrs. Hale. "Marv, I have smashed my models."

"Oh, John!"

"Smashed them to smithereens. They will do for kindling and scrap iron."

"Husband, are you crazy?"

"No, Mary; but I would have been something worse if I had given those models to the world. Now, let me tell you all about it."

The breakfast remained untasted while the inventor told his wife about the strange dream that had come to him three times the night before.

He had dreamed that his several inventions were all completed and in use throughout the country. They embraced various labor-saving machines and implements for factories, workshops, and the field. His name rang through the land. Wealth was heaped upon him, and millionaires feasted him, and pronounced him the greatest genius of the age. But in a short time poverty and distress came upon the masses. The starving poor rushed from the towns to the country, and were driven back by other hungry hosts on their way to the towns for relief. The labor-saving machines had done their work. There was room for only a few workers, and hundreds of thousands of toilers were knocked out by the machines.

Men clamoring for work were told everywhere that the country was suffering from over-production, and that the supply of labor exceeded the demand.

In the cities red-handed anarchists multiplied until the capitalists persuaded the government to proclaim martial law. In the country districts roving gangs of discharged laborers plundered the towns.

Amidst all this horrible anarchy the people cursed John Hale for taking the bread out of their mouths with his labor-saving inventions.

Three times this dream raged and seethed in the troubled brain of the inventor, and his first work that morning had been devoted to the destruction of his models.

"But, John," interposed his wife, when she had heard his story, "you have always said that with these inventions came new industries, and the men displaced went at something else."

"Yes," answered Hale sadly, "but in my dream the starving laborers told me that such talk was merely the argument of the capitalists. They said that there was a limit in such things, and that I have overstepped the limit."

"And is that true?"

"I don't know, but I have given my fellowmen the benefit of the doubt. I may have done a cranky thing, but I feel better for it."

Mrs. Hale left her chair and gave her husband a kiss.

"It is all right," she said cheerily, "but what will you do now?"

"Oh, what I have always advised discharged workmen to do—go at something else."

Then these two cranks laughed, and ate their breakfast together, merrier than they had been in many a day.

And yet they knew that John Hale had with his own hand wrecked his fortunes, and was henceforth in the eyes of the world a ruined man.

The Duke of Wellington and the Crank.

Like most great public men, the Duke of Wellington was liable to be intruded upon at any time of the day or evening at his house overlooking Hyde Park. A sentry was put at his door, and servants were constantly on duty. But even these precautions did not always save the old soldier from intruders.

One day, as he sat writing at his library-table quite alone, his door was suddenly opened without knock or announcement of any sort, and in stalked a gaunt man, who stood before the commander-in-chief with his hat on and a savage expression of countenance.

The Duke was, of course, a little annoyed at such an unceremonious interruption, and looking up, he asked: "Who are you?"

"I am Dionysius," was the singular answer.

"Well, what do you want?"

"Your life."

"My life?"

"Yes; I am sent to kill you."

"Very odd," said the Duke, sitting back and calmly gazing at the intruder.

"Not at all, for I am Dionysius," said the stranger; "and I must put you to death."

"Are you obliged to perform this duty today?" asked the commander-in-chief. "I am very busy just now, and have a large number of letters to write. It would be very inconvenient to-day."

The visitor looked hard during a moment's pause.

"Call again," continued the Duke, "or write and make an appointment."

"You'll be ready?"

"Without fail," was the reply.

The maniac, awed, doubtless, by the stern old soldier, backed out of the room without further words, and half an hour later was safe in Beilham.

Lord Palmerston's Plan of Evading an Office-Seeker.

The complaints uttered by a well-known statesman now in office about the manner in which his life is made a burden to him by senators and congressmen pestering him for favors for their proteges, recalls the method adopted by Lord Palmerston to dispose of applications of this character.

Old "Pam" was a past master in the art of getting out of granting favors without offending the applicants.

On one occasion a certain politician was anxious to obtain a consulate for a friend. He applied to Lord Palmerston, who was then in charge of the foreign office.

"Too happy to oblige you," said Lord Palmerston; "Call on me at Downing street tomorrow and I will see what can be done."

At the interview the following day he proposed a consulate in Asia Minor, worth about $3,000 a year. The politician was delighted, and thanked the foreign secretary most effusively. When he was taking his leave Lord Palmerston called out after him:

"Then I will have the papers sent for you to sign?"

"What papers?" demanded the surprised politician.

"Why, don't you know," replied Lord Palmerston, "that whoever recommends a consul has to sign a guarantee that he will be responsible for all the money which passes through the consul's hands."

This remark ended the question. There was no more trouble about the consulate, for the politician was not going to make himself responsible for a man whom he well knew to be a gambler, a fact which was no secret to Lord Palmerston.

If some such practice as this were adopted at the various government departments at Washington, and the senators and congressmen were required to furnish financial guarantees for all the candidates for office they recommend to the heads of the various departments, the latter would have far less of their time taken up in seeking to distribute a limited amount of patronage among an altogether unlimited number of candidates.—Marquise de Fontenay.

In Egypt the dog was a friend and faithful servant. He lived in the house with his master, followed him in his walks, attended the public ceremonies, sometimes free, at other times held in leash by a slave or child, or in princely families by a favorite dwarf. At his meals he had his place marked under the benches of the guests.

"A Kentucky Gentleman, Sah."

An easterner, while riding along a bowlder-strewn road in Kentucky, espied an old fellow approaching, dragging his feet as if they were encumbrances, and shaking his fist toward the skies above.

"Good morning, dear sir. What's the matter with you?" was the horseman's greeting.

"No matter 'tall; jes fresh cut!"

"I mean no offense. You looked like a man sufferin' from some unusual trouble."

"Am sufferin'; but 'ta'nt nuthin' unusual; jes as usual as daylight, sah."

"Would you object to telling me your trouble? I might assist you."

"I don't object ter telling ye, but as fer assistin' me, nuthin' short of death can do that."

"Is it that bad?"

"Yes, an' wus too. I'm a married man, sah!"

"Family trouble, then?"

"No; jes my trouble. All the others o' the family are enjoyin' themselves, while I suffer, an' weep, and pray to die."

"How does it all come?"

"Comes with a second wife, sah. A mean painter of a woman that I married a week ago. Oh, Lordy, you don't know how I suffer, an' how that wildcat watches my life-blood a-drippin' away! I once had a good woman. Oh, she was a woman right. For thirty blessed years we lived together. Durin' that ar time no woman ever served a man better. She 'tended fifteen acres of co'n ever' summer, an' never was the woman ter say to me, 'Jake, hadn't yer better help me a little ter-day?' or, 'Jake, how would you like to go an' feed the hogs an' fodder the cattle this morning?' No, sah; she loved her man too well fer that. But I reckon I'm treated right fer not obeyin' her deathbed reques'. Jes afore death cum ter take her, she sed: 'Jake, don't never marry. Don't do it, Jake. You'll not find ever'body like Becky. Some varmint of a woman, I'm afeard, will git you and expect ye to h'p do the work.' I'm a Kentucky gentleman, sah; never was raised to work, sah. Catch more foxes than anybody in the county; that's a gentleman's sport, sah. Well, I didn't take Becky's advice, sah. I married agin a week ago, as I sed afore. The next mornin' arter the splice she wanted me ter git up an' make the fire. Two days later she tried ter force me to h'p gather a load o' co'n. Yistiday she wanted me to go up on the mountain an' haul down a load o' pine knots, sah. I, of course refused, sah, as became a Kentucky gentleman, sah, an' she threw a gourd of soft soap on me! An hour ago, jes afore I started off, she larruped me with a sled standard ter try ter make me turn the grindstone while she ground the axe. I'm a Kentucky gentleman, sah, an' won't stand it, sah! I'm going down ter 'Squire Jimmison's ter git a divorce, sah. I must be in a hurry, sah, as the 'squire is going off to-day. Good-mornin', sah.—Harpers Magazine.

Shadows of Venus.

Purinkja discovered a very simple and highly entertaining experiment by means of which the retina, with all its veins and blood vessels standing out in relief against it, can be thrown into the air before one's eyes. It is called the aborescent figure, from its likeness to a many-branched tree, and is produced in the following manner: In a dark room at night move a candle backward and forward before the eyes, these being firmly fixed on the walls beyond. After a few seconds the air will assume a reddish appearance, and running over it in all directions may be seen the veins and blood vessels in bold relief, while toward the center of the figure there rises up a dark trunk, from which the veins branch out on all sides. The trunk is visible where the optic nerve enters the eye, and this experiment is chiefly interesting to the student as proving that the parts of the retina which actually receive and produce the sensation of light must lie behind the blood vessels, since these cast their shadow on to it, and we are enabled to see them, as we see any other object, externally.—Chambers' Journal.

A Meteor of the Sea.

The jelly-fish shines in the sea at night just as the meteor does in the over-arching sky. One of the most wonderful of these fishes ever seen was that viewed by Mr. Telfair, the naturalist, in 1840, near Bombay. Natives had reported at various times that a gigantic flaming monster had been seen in the sea, and some said they had beheld it in the sky years before, evidently meaning a comet. Finally Mr. Telfair himself saw the creature, which proved to be a jelly-fish of enormous size. Its tentacles at night seemed a fiery train over three hundred feet in length. Each tentacle appeared like a red-hot wire gleaming with a brilliant light, while the body was like a huge electric globe, throwing out light for many feet about it. The jelly-fish finally ran ashore, or was washed in. For several nights after it stranded it gave out so strong a light that it was visible for a considerable distance, and illuminated the forms and faces of those who stood about it with great brilliancy. It is estimated that it weighed two tons, and is believed to have been the largest invertebrate animal ever seen.

Justice Prevailed.

There was once a robber in Cairo who fell from the second story of a house he was trying to enter and broke his leg. Thereupon he went to the cadi and complained. The man's window was badly made, and he wanted justice. The cadi said that was reasonable, and he summoned the owner of the house. The owner confessed that the house was poorly built, but claimed that the carpenter was to blame and not he.

This struck the cadi as sound logic, and he sent for the carpenter. "The charge is, alas! too true," said the carpenter; "but the masonry was at fault, and I couldn't fit a good window." So the cadi, impressed with the reasonableness of the argument, sent for the mason.

The mason pleaded guilty, but explained that a pretty girl in a blue gown had passed the building while he was at work, and that his attention had been diverted from his work. The cadi then demanded that the girl be brought before him.

"It is true," she said, "that I am pretty, but it's no fault of mine. If my gown attracted the mason, the dyer should be punished and not I." "Quite true," said the cadi; "send for the dyer."

The dyer was brought to the bar, and, hoping to help his business, he pleaded guilty. That settled it. The cadi told his robber to take the guilty wretch to his house and hang him from the doorsill, and the populace rejoiced that justice had been done. But pretty soon the crowd returned to the cadi's house, complaining that the dyer was too long to be hanged from his doorsill. "Oh, well," said the cadi, who by that time was suffering with ennui, "go find a short dyer and hang him. Justice shall prevail!"

Rosemary.

In the south of Europe the rosemary has long had magic properties ascribed to it. The Spanish ladies used to wear it as an antidote against the evil eye, and the Portuguese called it the Elfyn plant, and dedicated it to the fairies. The idea of the antidote may have been due to a confusion of the name with that of the virgin; but, as a matter of fact, the "rosmarinus" is frequently mentioned by old Latin writers, including Horace and Ovid. The name came from the fondness of the plant for the seashore, where it often gets sprinkled with the "ros" or dew of the sea, that is to say sea spray. Another cause of confusion, perhaps, was that the leaves of the plant somewhat resembled those of the juniper, which in medieval times was held sacred to the Virgin Mary.

In the island of Crete, it is said, a bride dressed for the wedding still calls, last of all, for a sprig of rosemary to bring her luck. And now we come to find rosemary in close association with both marriage and death, just as the hyacinth was, and perhaps still is, among the Greeks. It is interesting to trace the connection by which the same plant came to have two such different uses.

One of the earliest mentions of rosemary in English literature is in a poem of the fourteenth century, called "The Glorouse Rosemaryne," which begins thus:

This herbe is callit rosemaryne,
Of vertu that is gode and fyne;
But all the vortues tell I ne can,
Nor, I trowe, erthely man.

A Cry of Despair.

"Some time ago," says a Missourian, "a poor family came to our town. There was a widow and three daughters, two of them about grown. They took up their quarters in an old deserted house, and it wasn't long until we heard that they hadn't anything to eat.

"Well, a lot of us went out to the old house, and, sure enough, there they were, mighty nigh starved to death. Right there, sir, we raised $8, and told the widow we'd see that she didn't go hungry. The grateful woman gave the money to her daughter, and said: 'Lou, you and the children run right away down town and get something with this money.'

"Well, off the girl put, and we waited to enjoy the pleasure of seeing them satisfy their hunger. They came back after a while, and now, what do you reckon they had bought?"

"I have no idea."

"Well, sir, they bought four finger rings and a quart of molasses!"

"The miserable fools. The poor mother must have been indignant."

"You bet she was."

"And what did she say?"

"Why, she said: 'Lou, I'd like to know what in common sense made you buy so many of these here blamed molasses!'"—New York Tribune.

Binkle—I had a great notion to lick my boy for getting to the bottom of his geography class to day. Pinkle—Why didn't you? Binkle—Well, he put some of the questions to me that the teacher put to him, and as I couldn't answer one of 'em, I let him go and licked the teacher.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Throughout the Atlantic states the national republican party is now effecting a complete organization for the approaching presidential campaign. The issues are plainly defined, and are simply protection, reciprocity, and honest money on the republican side, with free trade and depreciated currency as the democratic slogan. There is no room for any other national party in this contest. The present congress, which is largely democratic, is floundering amid the issues, and is practically without a leader on the majority side. The epigram of General Grant, "that the democrats could always be relied on to do the wrong thing at the right time," was never more likely to be verified than now. The people have been taught to realize that the doctrine of protection to American industry and manufacture is the true American idea, and that the calamities prognosticated by the democratic free traders have not come to pass. We are, therefore, on a progressive and aggressive platform, while the opposition is on the run and on the defensive. But notwithstanding the issues are made up, there must be thorough organization of the party cohorts, and the Pacific states, are thus far without any systematic organization. It must be observed that the democracy is always organized by means of its leagues and clubs, which centers in that great and powerful organization known as "Tammany," in New York. Our state central committee is moving in the right direction by calling upon the republicans to muster in force in this state by the organization of clubs in every precinct in the state. To-night there will be a meeting of republicans to consummate the plan and idea of the central committee. In this there must be no selfishness, no attempt to further individual interests, all must be sunk in the welfare of the great party.

In the issue of THEMIS of last week we spoke concerning the mandamus proceedings brought by the city board of education against the city trustees. Those proceedings have been brought in the superior court. While it is a misfortune there should be a clashing between the arms of the municipal government, we are convinced the board of education could not have acted otherwise. Last week we published the law governing both boards with relation to the estimates for the support of the city schools, and demonstrated that the board of education had followed the law strictly. That board in making up their estimate was governed by the provision of section 18, article xi of the constitution: "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year. * * * Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision shall be void."

Can language be plainer? Let us look back at the history of the state and municipal governments and we can see a reason for this wise provision. So early as 1856 Governor Johnson called the attention of the legislature that by the improvidence that had prevailed, and was then prevailing, the state was becoming bankrupt. This warning was reiterated by succeeding governors, until finally a rigid prohibitory constitutional provision was enacted remedying this evil. The wisdom of this enactment has been proven, and it was found so essentially wise and sound that the last constitutional convention made it applicable to municipal governments.

If a city was ever cursed by the recklessness of its past officials, surely Sacramento must be counted among the number. Our bonded indebtedness is a monument of past negligence, almost criminal, and a legacy of bitterness and hatred under which the present generation are suffering. To prevent a repetition of such mal-administration is the desire of the board of education. A revision of the tax levies for school and other purposes in this city from 1875, a period of 16 years, may be of interest; and in considering the figures it should be remembered the assessment roll was not materially increased until very recently. In 1875, the total city tax was $1 67 on the $100, and of that 35 cents was for school purposes, the maximum the law contemplates. In 1876, of a total of $2 08, the school tax was 35 cents. In 1877, it remained the same upon a total levy of $2. In 1878, while the levy was increased to $2 20, the school tax was reduced to 30 cents. In 1879, the total tax was $2 50, and the schools obtained 30 cents. In 1880, the tax levy was $2, and the schools had 30 cents. In 1881-2 the figures were the same. In 1883, the total tax was $1 60, and the schools obtained 30 cents. In 1884, total rate was astonishingly low, $1 20, and yet the school tax remained at 30 cents. In 1885, the school rate was the same upon a levy of $1 90. In 1886, the tax levy was increased to $2 10, and the school tax was cut down to 15 cents. The school records of that year disclose that, "on motion of J. F. Slater, it was ordered that the board require the city trustees to levy a city tax of 25 cents on each $100 taxable property for the support of the city schools for the year 1886. All voted aye except E. K. Alsip, who moved to put 20 in place of 25, but received no second." And Mr. Alonzo Conklin voted thereon, and was then chairman of the finance committee. The glorious result of this financial wisdom was a shortage at the end of the year of $8,302, which has been an incubus upon all succeeding boards. In 1887, the school tax was 20 cents upon a total of $1 90. This year, and Mr. Alonzo Conklin was president of the board, a tax levy of 25 cents was asked for, and the finance record of the board shows a deficit of $8,406 36, which indebtedness was generously handed over as a New Year's present to the succeeding board. In 1888, the total tax rate was $2, and the school levy 28 cents. The minutes show that the tax was not deemed sufficient, and a motion to mandamus was made, but no action was taken. In 1889, the tax levy for school purposes was 32 cents, though the board did request a levy of 35 cents. In 1890, there was a school tax of 29 cents on a total tax levy of $2 20. In 1891, the school tax was 32 cents on a total of $2 20; the board asked for 35 cents. In this year there was, however, levied a special police tax of 12 cents, so that in reality the tax rate was $2 32. For the current year the school tax has been levied at 26 cents, while 35 cents has been asked for. The incoming board found a deficit at the beginning of this year, even with a 32-cent levy of $4,000, which is the natural result of former inadequate levies. The consequences resulting from these shortages are dilapidated school-houses, yards that in the winter season have pools of water, sidewalks that menace life and limb, the general lacking of necessary school apparatus, and many other necessities and conveniences absolutely requisite for the comfort and better instruction of our children.

We were about to say the pending municipal election is of peculiarity; on slight reflection we know it is not. A painful sameness; an attack upon the republican nominees, and from the established quarter. The Bee has the undoubted right to do as it pleases; it is a business journal. But the Record-Union—there is a consistent history that extends over a decade.

We do not complain the owners of the Record-Union—the Southern Pacific Company—do engage in politics. True it has been, we have assisted the corporation to protect it against unjust assault; will do so again if necessity will occur. But there has been a declaration the corporation is out of politics, and as the late Jeff. Davis put it, desire to be severely let alone. We do not fully understand it that way, else why in the world does dictation come from San Francisco relative to the control of nominating conventions and elections here? We are free to say we do not believe the directory of the company are at all concerned in the local politics of this city and county; it cannot, however, escape the notice of our people San Francisco influence is exerted to direct and control our local politics. But merciful, it would be Sacramento city should be permitted to run its municipal affairs without the intervention of self-constituted guardians, whose judgment so far has not been creditable to themselves, and whose future, as we have it now outlined, may justly be characterized as vile. Someone who essayed to speak for the Southern Pacific Company from San Francisco assumed the responsibility of naming in advance the persons the people of this county should elect to the legislature; and the names were peddled about on the streets. Our primaries and conventions were shaped to the end they would be returned. If the company is out of politics it should muzzle some of its officious subordinates.

That the Record-Union is not owned in Sacramento is understood; that Mr. Huntington is not concerned in its publication here would seem manifest from a significant sentence in one of the famous letters introduced in the Colton case: that the best thing to do with it would be to box it up and cast it into the river. Yet it is the people of Sacramento are not permitted to mildly elect members of their municipal governing board without the dictation of gentlemen from abroad. This matter of interference is not new. Some years ago Mr. Brown was nominated for mayor by the democrats. The republicans tendered the nomination to several gentlemen of good character and excellent standing, but they declined and explained that circumstances appeared which made their declinations imperative. Finally, Mr. Steffens accepted the republican nomination. The files of the Record-Union contain much of evidence: the paper first committed itself to Steffens; at the last moment "a change came o'er the spirit of its dreams;" it was a matter of public comment on the streets the night before the last flop—the orders had been received from below it should support Brown.

Three years ago the predicament of the local management of the foreign organ was indeed pitiable; a placement of men that justified the homicide of those responsible for their position. It had been determined below a democrat should be elected to the board of trustees of Sacramento, and the journalistic exponent of the policy of the San Francisco owners so directed the trimming of the sails of the hyphenized organ of thought that foundation was laid for democratic success, through the creation of a false issue on the liquor-license question. It was presented in a shape that Major McLaughlin, the democratic nominee, could declare himself in favor of low license, and be assured of the liquor vote, while whomever might be presented by the republicans would be placed in the position of absolutely losing that vote, with no assurance of support from the high-license advocates—a standpoint that had no relief from small treachery. It did happen, however, when Mr. Stevens received the republican nomination the directors at the San Francisco helm determined, at the eleventh hour, to support him. The orders came too late. We must credit the local management with the wearing out of much shoe leather in traveling about the city to solicit the counsel of leading republicans as to the best way to extricate the paper from an awkward bog. It was impossible, however, to rectify the blunder that had been committed. There have been generals who had the capacity to direct their troops from a distance; it is of demonstration, however, warriors have been more successful who were present on the field. The principle is generally the same: to successfully conduct a newspaper the controllers should be upon the ground. The telephone is a remarkable invention, but it is not in it when it is employed to run a newspaper in a distant town.

For a reason that is unexplained the policy of the San Francisco owners of the Record-Union has been for years back to antagonize the republican ticket, and to saddle the municipality with an incompetent board. It is refreshing they speak of "control, bossism, and hirelings." There may be a satisfaction the shortage bills of the concern will be paid without worryment or good management by the local engineers. Much they are in the position of the son-in-law to wealth: wife's daddy will paint the house. There is, however, the compensation to the editor of a paper of independence: he can write untrammelled; if he makes an erroneous break, like dying, he must do it alone.

Now it does occur from the consultation had Sunday the dictators at San Francisco determined to strike at Mr. Green, the republican nominee for trustee. We presume this determination surprises no one; it but comports with their attitude with relation to the affairs of the people of Sacramento they have pursued for years past. It does seem remarkable the Southern Pacific Company will permit its subordinates to interject a subtle influence in the government of a city that from the standpoint of human charity should be spared a blow from a distance, and from men who are not in position to know our needs. The people here have been conspicuously subservient; why rub it in? It would hardly seem in this late day necessity exists a democratic organ should be maintained here by the company. It would seem they could as well run their roads and permit local enterprise to own and conduct the press; the people to elect their local officers without foreign interference.

Inconsistency. About biennially we are appealed to to down the democracy. In 1882 it was not the case; then Stoneman was the favorite gubernatorial candidate of the railroad people. The medicine received from the legislature of 1883, it would seem, should be remembered. Let that, however, go. It is not for us to excuse the unpardonable folly of the political management of railroad politics of late years. It does, however, strike us time has come common sense should sway. To blow hot at one election, cold at another; to manifestly strike at the financial interests of the people of a friendly city, it seems to us, hardly wisdom.

Now it is the mandate comes from below our people must defeat Mr. Green for second trustee. If we understand it right, the claim is made the democratic candidate, Major McLaughlin, knows more about the duties of the office than his republican competitor; that the city has educated him, and therefore Green should not be in the fight. The fact is, Green has resided in this state and in Nevada since 1850, and for most of that time was a mining superintendent, and did control men and important works. Our grave foreign contemporary seems fearful Mr. Green will need education relative to the streets, levees, sewerage system, water-works, etc., and it would appear, did calamity befall Major McLaughlin, his place could not be filled. We do not know what our nervous neighbors would do should la grippe seize strong hold of him, or if the impetuous minister of state, Mr. Blaine, would declare hostilities with a foreign power. Think! would it be, the military ardor of the major would draw him into the combat; possibly to perishment! Who would be left amongst us who could determine the difference between an improved street and a section of the north levee? To whom could we look for information as to the location of the quarry from whence the cement blocks for our patent sidewalks are obtained? Upon the question of the disposition of the city sewage, it occurs to us other cities have looked into the matter somewhat. Our recollection is, the subject has been periodically agitated here since at least December, 1882. That nothing has been done save to talk about it is perhaps due to the fact the local managers of our San Francisco contemporary have not sufficiently educated the street commissioner.

And the mysterious water-works! We have taken the trouble to get information concerning them, and the information was furnished us by a school-boy. From his statement we are led to believe an underground pipe taps the Sacramento river at the foot of I street and extends to the city hall. The lad explained to us that the purpose of the men in shoveling coal into a furnace in the lower story was to warm up the water in the boilers above, and that the steam generated was utilized to turn a piece of machinery that resembles the entrails of a clock, save that it is constructed on a larger scale and has no pendulum. Attached to this engine is a crank that works a bar of iron in and out of a large iron barrel. It was explained to us that this was one of the pumps that sucked the water from the river and forced it into the arterial water system of the city. We may not have understood this thing thoroughly, and perhaps the conductors of our daily contemporary are right that a matter of that kind cannot be understood by a man of ordinary intelligence, except after a public education of something like three years. It would be perhaps impolitic did we rashly jump at a conclusion from the representations made to us by the school boy-referred to. However, we venture that if the water in the Sacramento river holds out, if the men will keep on shoveling coal into the furnace and the pumps do not break down, the people of this community will continue to receive their usual water supply, the bondholders will continue to draw their 55 per cent. gross of the revenue, and the host of water collectors will have a fair opportunity to consume the balance. We readily comprehend the embarrassment a raw trustee will labor under, and the necessity there should be a Record-Union education of the members of our governing board. We might assume from the gravity of the statements of the Record-Union a green citizen who would discover water running from a hydrant at a point three feet above the natural surface, would assume the water was running up hill, and that it would take him about three years to learn the contrary. If it is imperative we shall educate trustees before they will be elected, why in the world should our contemporary not advocate that a special class for that purpose be maintained in the public schools?

We look upon this matter lightly in the sense that the objections urged from San Francisco are nonsensical, and we are conscious they lack in sincerity. However, we desire to enter a very earnest protest against a repetition of past betrayments, and urge that the people of Sacramento shall assume control of their own affairs.

We believe that there is no question of such vital importance to the people of this country as that of the annexation of the dominion of Canada to the United States. Our statesmen in the past have treated this matter with altogether too much apathy. They have seemed to feel as though we had no interest in our neighbor whatever. But within the past few years a number of difficult problems have presented themselves for solution, of vast importance to each country, which have been a source of constant irritation and friction.

Among the more prominent of these questions are the cod and seal fishery disputes and the settlement of the boundary between Alaska and British Columbia.

Canada possesses a population of nearly 5,000,000. The border line between Canada and the United States is over 4,000 miles long, and for a space of 500 miles immediately north of that line the land is exceedingly fertile. The greater portion of this immense tract of country is one of the finest small-grain growing countries in the world. Since the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, the lands immediately north of Montana, Dakota and Minnesota are being settled. The population of Manitoba and Assinaboia and Alberta has nearly doubled in the past decade. The amounts produced of wheat, barley, rye and oats, per acre, in these last mentioned provinces, greatly exceed the production of any except the most favored portions of the United States. The dominion of Canada is by far the best watered and best timbered portion of North America, and the stretch of country referred to above, lying east of the Rocky Mountains, 2,000 miles long and 500 miles wide, is by no means the cold, bleak, uninhabitable country imagined. Lying in the same latitude as that of Great Britain, and south of that of Norway and Sweden, the natural rigor of the north being tempered by the ocean breeze from the Japanese current, the winters are not as long nor so severe as those in the northern portion of Dakota and Minnesota.

It has been estimated that Canada is capable of easily supporting 100,000,000 of people. Whether this be true or not it is able to support a vast population, and all of her interests are identical with ours. We have by the exercise of a farseeing statesmanship protected our industries so that we have become a great manufacturing people. The high rate of wages paid to artisans and to laborers of all grades and occupations has attracted an immense immigration to this country from all the nations of Europe. Railroads have been laid in every direction throughout our broad domain. But the available lands have nearly all been taken up by settlers and speculators, and the poor man can with difficulty obtain lands from the government. The result is that the poorer class of people are driven to the cities to find employment, and when found, at a comparatively poor remuneration. This has created a feeling of unrest among the laboring classes. We notice this in the increased number of strikes that are almost daily inaugurated. By annexing Canada a vast domain would be opened up for immediate settlement. Instead of the great rush that is being made for the large cities the tide would again turn toward the country and toward agricultural employments.

The policy of our government has been for forty years to encourage the location of government land by actual settlers. The laws are gradually becoming more stringent, so that it is very difficult for speculators to obtain large tracts of land. A nation is great in proportion to the number of its small land holdings. Curtail the immigration laws and Canada will afford lands for settlement for fifty years to come. Again, Canada is seriously considering the adoption of a free trade policy. This will be done for the very reason that our country has a high protective tariff. Manufactures will be started in that country, and with over four thousand miles of frontier to guard, it will be impossible to prevent smuggling at a wholesale rate. Again, Canada has an unlimited quantity of the finest timber just north of our border. Our own forests have been denuded to supply the great and increasing demand. Unless Canada is annexed by us she will supply us with timber at a great loss to us. Why, then, not annex her to the United States? There is no good reason why we should not. A great majority of her people are in favor of it, and are continually agitating the question. In fact, the great dividing line between the political parties of Canada is based upon this very question of annexation. They are a brave, honest, industrious people. Her sons and daughters are by tens of thousands annually migrating to the United States to get the benefit of our tariff laws, and those that remain have thus the strongest reasons for being joined to us. Let us then annex her, as we can do so peaceably. We will then be one nation in fact, and the people of both countries can cut bait and fish, cut timber, manufacture, raise agricultural products without regard to tariff questions or treaty stipulations, and have nearly the whole of North America to exchange their commodities in. We are allied to them by blood, customs and manners. Let us hasten the day when we shall be joined to them in fact and in deed.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The New York debut of Joseph Grismer and Phœbe Davis will be made in August at the Madison Square Theater.

Mr. Wilkinson's Widows was given at the Metropolitan last night to a good house. It is a pretty and attractive comedy. It will be repeated to night.

George Hanlon, the famous acrobat, is about to enter the ministry. He ought to give a good illustration of muscular Christianity.

Jerome Eddy is writing a new play which will be heard next season. It will have a sensational scene which will employ six horses.

John R. Rogers has booked over one-half of Wilson's Barrett's tour for next year. Mr. Barrett will bring over from London two new plays and his own company.

John W. Mackay, Jr., gave an elaborate dinner party in honor of Marie Van Zandt, in New York a few evenings since. Mackay is 22 years old—and Marie is 20, too.

"So he praised my singing, did he?" "Yes; he said it was heavenly." "Did he really say that?" "Well, not exactly, but he probably meant that. He said it was unearthly."

On Monday night Hoyt's latest and greatest success, A Texas Steer, will be given at the Metropolitan. The company is substantially the same that presented the comedy last year.

"Won't you favor us with one of your own pieces?" said Mrs. De Porque to the professor. "Vell, since you vish eet, I vill play you a number from my new opera." "Certainly, professor," said Mrs. De Porque, with affability, "as many as you wish; but, professor, a number of what?"

Mr. Lorimer Stoddard, the actor, is a son of the poet Richard Henry Stoddard. He has made a success of his stage career, and is remembered as the funny little lord in Robson and Crane's The Henrietta. Mr. Stoddard has also found time to do some literary work, and is the author of the little comedy She'll be Happy To-morrow.

The four-act farce of The Cabinet Minister, by Arthur W. Pinero, is bright and entertaining, but unquestionably better suited for the closet than for the stage, though with its parts assigned to competent actors it would not be dull. The vivacious Imogen Twombly retains to the dance in the closing scene the interest which she excites at first. The humor throughout is fresh and enlivening.

On Thursday night Miss Mabel Casedy took her departure to join the Carleton opera company. We feel assured that there is a high place in store for Miss Casedy on the operatic stage. She is possessed of a strong, clear voice, and has a magnificent stage presence. Whenever the young lady appeared before the public as an amateur she evinced fine dramatic as well as musical power. We expect to hear of great achievements from our little Sacramento nightingale.

Manager Norton has a really good stock company at the Clunie. The production of Little Lord Fauntleroy this week was superior to the original in many particulars. Georgie Cooper is a bright little genius. In her personation there was originality without the shadow of imitation. The cast throughout was excellent, each artist fitting the part. Craig, Cooper, Delano, Benrimo, Miss Woodthorpe and Miss Carmen form a splendid stock combination. The staging at this house is of the best. To-night and Sunday night this company will present the popular play Among the Pines, in which Miss Woodthorpe is said to be particularly happy. The management will have two new attractions next week.

Edmund C. Stanton, in the North American Review, gives an interesting history of the opera from a national view, from which we extract the following: The impresario of the future will not confine himself to Italy or to Germany. The Slavic countries and Hungary have already produced operas of sterling merit and startling originality. And what a splendid operatic mine has yet to be exploited for our benefit in Russia, which can boast of not only a national but of an international operatic repertory, including works by composers of all countries, not excepting Wagner, and which has symphonic and operatic composers like Rubinstein and Tschaiowsky. Turning to Bohemia, there is Devorak, whose cantatas alone are known to us, but who has written several interesting operas for the Bohemian stage; while England has produced of late years several grand operas by her native composers, some of which have been adopted in the German operatic repertory. France, too, has many modern writers of opera, whose works have not yet been heard here, but which have found brilliant interpretation, for the most part in Brussels.

Book Chat.

Bill Nye's pretense that he has written a play is about the funniest thing he ever did.

Julien Gordon, otherwise known as Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger, weeps profusely and refuses to be comforted when her books are unfavorably criticised by the newspapers.

Richard Malcolm Johnson has completed a novel which he regards as his strongest work. It is called "Widow Guthrie," and pictures various social phases in the Georgia of sixty years ago.

Walt Whitman, Robert Browning, Martin Tupper: three men who in life tasted the sweet of popularity because they were peculiar. Tupper's fame did not last as long as he. Browning's began to decline on the day of his death. Will Whitman's linger on when he is gone?

A new edition of the writings of Thomas Jefferson has been edited by Paul Leicester Ford for the Putnams. Mr. Ford has for years devoted himself to studies in earlier American history, and has given special attention to the subject of Jefferson. The edition comprises ten volumes.

We need no longer go to France, Greece, or Great Britain for our plays. The time has come when the United States produces her own drama, as she produces her own poetry, oratory, newspapers and bread-stuffs. American soil and genius have a legitimate and promising field in drama, as in all else.

Mark Trafton is preaching to mankind the philosophy of hearty breakfasts, and a good philosophy it is. The poet stated a pat truth when he said: "Fate cannot harm me; I have dined to-day;" but fate usually encounters the ordinary man during the daytime before the dinner hour, and a well-filled stomach is a good bulwark against it.

The London Literary Opinion chivalrously regrets that so few American writers are known over there, but names "Mr." Craddock as one of our reputable authors whose novels are read. It says that "Mr." Craddock deserves a vogue far better than many another of "his" compatriots; that "Mr." Craddock has a pretty humor, and "he" has also pathos, etc. Our literary critic forgets that this gifted writer is not a "Mr."

"The Story of Jane Austen's Life," by Oscar Fay Adams. Jane Austen, the novelist, is too well known to the literary world to need much more said concerning her; but Jane Austen, the woman, is still a stranger to most of those who read her books. To place her before the world as the winsome, delightful woman that she really was, and thus to dispel the unattractive, not to say forbidding, mental picture that so many have formed of her, was the purpose of the author of this volume, who received the hearty collaboration of the Austen kindred.

Among the rare and valuable books in the late Duke of Devonshire's library there are a few of which there are no duplicates anywhere, and, what is still more extraordinary, no one has ever read them. The following are some of them: "Percy Vere," in forty volumes; "Tadpoles, or Tales out of My Own Head;" "The Life of Zimmerman," by himself; "Boyle on Steam;" "Voltaire, Volney, Volta," three volumes; "Barrow on the Common Weal;" and "The Recollections of Bannister," by Lord Stair. These curious titles were supplied to the Duke by Thomas Hood for lettering certain sham volumes. It is much easier to give names to sham books than to real ones, as novelists have reason to know. If all the good stories have not been told, most of the good titles have been taken, and there is no means, thanks to the idiocy of the authorities at Stationers' Hall—who only enter books by their authors' names—of finding out whether they have been taken or not. Even when the enterprising publisher who lives on the blackmail exacted for an unhappy coincidence of this kind did not exist, there was always a difficulty in selecting titles. We are told that "The Rambler" was one so little understood that a French journalist translated it "Le Chevalier Errant," and, when it was corrected to "L'Errant," that a foreigner drank Johnson's health by the appellation of "Mr. Vagabond." It is curious, by the way, that Disraeli the elder prophesied failure to "The World" (a much earlier one than the present), upon the ground that it suggested a mere circuit round St. James' street, which shows that a philosopher is not always a journalist, though a journalist should be always a philosopher. "The Champion of Virtue," the same authority tells us, could find no readers, but, as "The Old English Baron," it passed (one may add, in spite of its excessive dullness) through many editions.

Professional Chat.

There are 6,000 lawyers in New York city.

A bad tempered lawyer is liable to file a cross-complaint. Good natured ones often do this.

It is credibly reported that since ex-senator Edmunds lectured the supreme court Chief Justice Fuller's mustache has relaxed a portion of its curl.

An illustration of the mortality among the judges of our supreme court is afforded in the circumstance that all of the present members, with the exception of Harlan and Field, have been appointed by the last three presidents.

When Pitt at twenty-one stood up in the house of commons to make his first and unpremeditated speech his elders listened in interested silence, and after he had finished Burke said: "It is not a chip of the old block, but the old block itself."

Dr. Gautrelet, of Vichy, says that a piece of cotton wool steeped in a 5 to 10 per cent. solution of pyrogallic acid and inserted in a pipe or cigar-holder will neutralize any possible effects of the nicotine in tobacco without in any way spoiling its taste.

Cardinal Manning was, to use his own phrase, "a formal skeptic" about medical science and a passionate foe of the cruelty wrought in its name. He hated physic, and, although he took great care of his health, he guided himself by the light of nature.

Insurance solicitor—"Well doctor, have you examined this new client?" Doctor—"I hadn't thought it necessary. You see I've been treating him for the last seven years." I. S.—"That's enough, doctor. If he survived that he must be a man of wonderful vitality."

Counsel for the defense—My client has a claim on the indulgence of the court, for he only took ten francs, without touching the pocket-book, which contained 5,000 francs. (Here the prisoner burst into tears.) Magistrate (affected)—Then you are sorry? Prisoner—Yes, for not seeing the pocket-book.—From the French.

A belated story of Cardinal Manning tells of his meeting, when a priest, with an Irishman whom he besought to take the pledge. "It's myself would take the pledge, your reverence, if I thought I needed it," said the son of the Emerald Isle, "but I thought the pledge was meant for those who took too much." "Well," said the future cardinal, by way of encouragement, "I have taken the pledge myself." "Indeed!" said the Irishman, "and did your reverence use to take too much?"

The audacity of Senator Edmunds in lecturing the supreme court on a point of law recalls an anecdote of Henry Clay, who once, while arguing a case before that august tribunal, stopped in the middle of his speech, advanced to the bench and helped himself to a pinch of snuff out of Mr. Justice Washington's box. Then, as he returned to his place, he remarked, "I see that your honor still sticks to the Scotch." Clay was the only man of his time who could dare to do such a thing, as Edmunds is of his own day.

Dr. Starr says that it is impossible to draw any conclusion from the size or shape of the head as to the extent or surface of the brain, and so as to the mental capacity. It is absurd to judge of the brain surface by either the size of the head or the extent of the superficial irregular surface which is covered by the skull without taking into consideration the number of folds or the depth of creases. "For a little brain with many deep folds may really, when spread out, have a larger surface than a large brain with few, shallow folds."

The late Judge Jeremiah S. Black was famous for his prompt and ready answer to all questions, and many of his responses have become historical. None were, however, more to the point than his definition of a "ring." It is well known that Judge Black was not a favorite with Chief Justice Sharswood, and, at one time, while arguing before the supreme court, Mr. Black used the term "ring." The chief justice who, as was his custom, was walking up and down in the rear of the other justices, stopped and exclaimed sharply: "Mr. Black, what is a ring?" "A ring, sir," was the prompt response, "is an aggregation of talented but unscrupulous men banded together for public plunder."

A living English bishop was staying at the house of a country gentleman who posed very ostentatiously as an ardent total abstainer. During dinner on the first day of the bishop's visit, there being nothing to drink on the table besides syrups and mineral waters, the host, turning toward his reverend guest, said in an undertone: "My lord, you will find some wine in your bedroom." The bishop briefly acknowledged this curious concession, and partook of the refreshments placed before him. Some short while after this the bishop received his teetotaler friend with becoming hospitality at the palace on a return visit. During dinner his lordship quietly remarked to his guest: "Mr. So-and-So, you will find some water in your bedroom."

NOTES.

Sixty persons a minute is the revised death-rate of the world, according to a recent French authority.

True religion does not consist in looking pious and wondering what the trimming on the dress in the next pew cost per yard.

According to a Maine belief, a nutmeg pierced and hung on a string around the neck prevents boils, croup and neuralgia.

This is the time of year when the comic valentine leers out of the shop window at the passer-by and the statistics of suicide show a large increase in consequence.

It is pitiful to note the manner in which some people, with none of the spirit of mirth in their souls, indulge in a forced laugh. A grimacial spasm, a dry cackle and the hollow mockery is over.

Washington's Birthday, Decoration Day, Labor Day and the Fourth of July each falls on Monday this year, and as next Christmas and New Year fall on Sunday they will also be celebrated on Monday.

There is no political question that does not involve and depend upon a moral question. Ethics is the life of religion. This being true, the discussion of political questions is as legitimate in the pulpit as on the stump.

The vitriol fiend has again asserted himself—this time in Chicago. A rejected suitor took fearful revenge on the object of his affections by throwing vitriol in her face. Such demons should be hanged, drawn and quartered.

With the Chile war cloud has vanished our prospects for a great gun factory at Benicia. The prospects of a gun factory on this coast are not flattering. If congress is prevailed upon to provide for such a factory it will probably be on the northern coast.

C. P. Huntington, the famous millionaire, likes nothing better, when feeling out of sorts, than to saw and split a few sticks of cord-wood. He used to do it for his health. He keeps on sawing wood, in a figurative sense, and continues to add to his millions.

During an exceedingly violent eruption in the sun, observed by astronomers on the 18th of last June, masses of matter were projected into space, it is estimated, at the rate of 600 miles a second. This speed was so long continued that these masses must have escaped the attraction of the sun.

At the last meeting of the police commissioners Mayor Comstock complained that the police officers were all at the democratic city convention that was held the week before, and without permission. Was not that the most flattering tribute he could have paid them? There was then no business for them on the streets. They knew their business and their place.

It seems somewhat singular that there is an outcry against an adequate levy for school purposes. The levy of 26 cents is only 5 cents more than the levy for police purposes. For the latter 21 cents is levied to pay 15 policemen while only 26 cents is given to pay over 100 teachers, not to mention the costs of running the department. The fact that we receive state and county aid is our good fortune, and no obligation from the trustees.

It is with unusual pleasure that we announce that the mollahs of Persia have removed the swinging long curse they had laid upon the use of tobacco, and that incense again arises from a million altars to nicotine in that once more happy land. The shah held out as long as he could, but finally canceled the monopoly he had sold to a British syndicate, and the weed is once more purchased at the old prices. Uncertain on its pins is a crown that rests upon the issue of people's tobacco, and the shah has found it out in time to save his bacon.

The board of trustees refuse even to levy the sum of 3 cents on the $100 for school purposes, after inviting the board of education to meet them under the implied understanding that 30 cents should be a compromise figure. The act of the trustees in inviting the board of education to such a conference, and then abruptly adjourning without action is a great discourtesy to the gentle men of the board of education. The accurate figures of the revenue and expenditures for the educational department, even with the 30 cents, would leave a deficit of over $2,000, not including any sum for the contemplated high-school building.

Hon. Jos. McKenna has been appointed by President Harrison circuit judge for the ninth circuit. It is evident that our favorite congressman held a high place in the estimation of the president. This is a deserved recognition of an able and learned man. No man on this coast is possessed of a finer judicial mind than Jos. McKenna. While he has never occupied the bench, those who know him best are able to determine the extent of his logical legal mind. As a legislator and parliamentarian he has but few superiors, and a brief time on the bench will develop his keen, logical judicial acumen. He has always been one of the closest students, and is a thorough scholar, classical as well as legal. When this distinguished honor did not fall upon Hon. W. C. Van Fleet, we are glad that our personal friend and fellow-student succeeded to the great honor.

Were we right we predicted the controllers of Sacramento politics—the bosses—would attempt to knife Mr. Green? It comes out rather straight. And so silly! He is opposed that he has not received a three-years' education at the expense of the city. Rodgers is urged for chief of police that he has not received the necessary education.

To say Sacramento lacks enterprise! What is the matter with the Bee? It reaps a harvest upon this little municipal election; prints pictures of the various candidates with flattering notices, at the rate, we understand, of four bits a line. It would seem the cash box in the counting room does control. Hardly the style that did prevail when the independent editor wrote.

Do women who want their rights ever stop to think what would happen if they were placed upon even competition with the other sex? If women had their alleged rights it would not mean that a chosen few would occupy lucrative callings and professions. It would mean that the whole sex was to be pitted against the world in competition for a livelihood. Man is physically stronger, tougher and more enduring than woman. He is more logical and clearer in his reason. With no favoritism or special consideration for her sex, woman would be crushed in competition by brutal man.

The appointment of Congressman McKenna to the United States judgeship creates a vacancy in the house of representatives that will have to be filled by a special election. Sacramento county has never been honored that one of its citizens has been chosen as a representative in the lower house of the federal legislature. Why not at this time make effort on behalf of one of our fellow-citizens? Hon. Grove L. Johnson is an available candidate, and would, if nominated, make a determined fight for election. At Washington he would zealously guard the interests of the people of his district.

Elsewhere we speak concerning the legal controversy between the board of education and the board of trustees. The trial of the matter was set for yesterday, but was continued a week on motion of the trustees. Thursday night a joint meeting was held of the two boards. Then it was the board of education expressed a willingness to compromise upon a rate that would at the very best leave them some $2,000 short at the ending of the year. The trustees, who have received the education deemed necessary by our San Francisco guardians, were consistent: they were unable to form a judgment. In the discussion it developed the trustees are sadly behind in their accounts, and it would appear they regard it financial wisdom other departments should run in debt. Wise is the tend of modern legislation: pay as you go, leave no legacy of debt for those who come after to pay.

Queer Theory About Insanity.

"There is something in the atmospheric conditions that develops insanity and murderous impulses," said a student of human nature. "That is my theory. It is like the grip and other diseases that prevail at certain times and under certain conditions. There are all sorts of diseases and impulses in people, and it only needs the conditions to develop them. Insanity is a peculiar disease, and to a greater or less degree exists in a pretty large proportion of mankind. In most cases it is shown in a harmless idiosyncrasy, and excites no more comment than mild ridicule, but in many cases it has a homicidal tendency that is suddenly and unexpectedly developed. Can this be through natural and general causes, or is it imitation that produces these mind waves? I believe it is the former—that general causes similar to the conditions that produce the grip wave, the cholera wave, the horse-distemper wave, or any other disease of a season also tend to unbalance the badly balanced mind."—New York Herald.

Men's Equality Comparative.

Humanly speaking, beyond the natural right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, there is, and of necessity can be, but little equality among men. There is everywhere and always, upon the last observation, an almost infinite gradation of qualities and capacities that go to determine the true altitude of every man, and to show that men are no more equal in intellect, morals and sociality than the trees of a forest are equal in height. And this fact, instead of impeaching—as some aver—the beneficence of the Creator, is one of the clearest proofs of His unerring wisdom; for without this gradation, there could be no satisfactory division of necessary human labor, and no harmonious community among men. If all men were equal, in all respects, who would be found willing to serve in any subordinate capacity, or accept any inferior reward or honor? Who would consent to toil and drudge while his no better fellow-man takes but the pleasurable post, or perchance idles in luxury? It is easy to see that with such a condition of humanity, there would be no willing doers of humbler duty. But if all such difficulty were to be overcome by each doing his own drudgery, still, perfect equality would reduce society to a monotonous dead-level. Without the spur of a possibility of superior individual excellence, the human mind would stagnate. Praise and blame would become idle terms, and ambition cease to stimulate where there were no chances for distinction. The Almighty knew better than our would-be social leaders—who, by the way, are for leveling down those who are above, rather than leveling up those who are below—how to qualify and dispose mankind for their own highest good. By the means of the very inequality, which foolish fault-finders would do away, if they could, God has provided fit hands for every species of human labor, giving some hopeful spur to every worker, and harmonizing the endless variety of conditions and professions. Human philosophy can no more improve this divine arrangement than it can improve the physical machinery of the universe. It is a part of "the eternal fitness of things," which characterizes all of God's works. But while the bad man must be ever condemned, and the foolish man given over to his folly, there is nothing, necessarily, in the inequality of human conditions derogatory to the humblest man. If he seeks the best he knows, and does the best he can, he will do his whole duty. If he accepts a toil beneath his capacity when he might have had a higher, he will demean and punish himself. It is the working out the best that is in man that attests his worth and nobility, and though his talent and sphere may be humble and inferior, his purpose and spirit, compared with his advantages, may be equal to the greatest man's. Equality, except in natural rights, must be forever among men a comparative term. Men are not equal to one another, but to what God has endowed them to be and do, and each finds his level and labor far more providentially than is generally understood.

Grim Humor.

"Patsy" Toody, the boxer and mimic, who died the other day, was better known in the fourth ward than "Mickey" Padden himself, says the New York Tribune. Toody was a natural wit, if one ever lived, and he was regarded as a diplomat by his constituents because he never did a day's work in his life. "Patsy" was "tough," but a bad cold caught at New Orleans about a year ago settled into consumption, which carried him away last week. On the day of his death "Patsy" turned to the doctor and priest in attendance, and said: "How is it with 'Patsy,' father?" "You are very low," said the good man, "and you will be with us for only a few hours." "That's too bad," said "Patsy," but his eyes twinkled merrily as he said: "I want to live over to-morrow, for I had some things which I wanted to do before I died. Call my wife." When the little woman came in "Patsy" asked the doctors to retire, and then said: "Don't cry, little woman, for 'Patsy' will be all right. Just go down to the store and get a half pound of gunpowder." When she came back with the explosive "Patsy" took the package and requested her to hand him the big tin tobacco box which stood on the mantel. It was half full of tobacco. Mixing the powder and tobacco together, "Patsy" handed the box to his wife and told her to put it back on the mantel. "You are wondering what that's for, little girl," said "Patsy," "and I will tell you. That's for my blooming friends to smoke at me wake to-morrow night."

A Strange Japanese Belief.

The Japanese believe in a species of fox which, if it lives to be fifty years old without having been chased by a dog, transforms himself into a beautiful woman. This same fox, if he lives to the age of 100 years, gains some new powers, among which is that of becoming a wonderful wizard. When he reaches the age of 1000 years, he becomes a celestial fox, with nine golden-colored tails, and has the power of going to heaven whenever he chooses.

The Secret of a Good Memory.

Whatever may be said in regard to training the memory it must be remembered that memory is not, as used to be supposed, an independent faculty of the mind that in some mysterious way may be directly strengthened by exercise, as the blacksmith strengthens his arm; but that memory is retentive is due to the plasticity of nerve substance and to the property of nerve centers by which they retain in growth their functional modifications; and that recollection depends upon physiological conditions such as the cerebral circulation and the proper functioning of nerve cells; moreover, that a complete act of recollection is a complex process involving comparison, inference, and the like. Hence, whatever in general is conducive to vigorous health, and whatever tends to habits of clear and orderly thinking—such conditions will aid recollection. And whatever is detrimental to the normal functioning of the nerve cells—fatigue, intense emotion, or the like—and whatever blinds the judgment will hinder recollection. In short, all psychological beatitudes are on the head of him who has good health, sane emotions and trained power of attention. But no amount of study, nor all the prescriptions of mnemonic doctors, from Simonides to Loissette (except so far as they train attention) can atone for anæmia of body or lack of the power of attention.—Prof. William H. Burnham, in February Scribner.

On the Wrong Scent.

First Little Girl (at fashionable summer resort)—"I'm awful glad to get 'quainted with you 'cause you're nice."

Second Little Girl—"So'm I with you. That's what we come for. Mamma says so herself."

"To get 'quainted?'"

"Yes, with nice people—people in society, you know."

"Why, that's just what mamma wants. We're to get 'quainted with people in society."

"Ain't you in society in the city?"

"No. You are, aren't you?"

"No. We've been rakin' and scrapin' the whole winter to come here and get 'quainted with people in society, you know."

"So've we."

"Then your folks ain't anybody at home?"

"No."

"Neither are we."

"Guess there ain't much use of us gettin' 'quainted."

"Guess not."

"Good-by."

"Good-by."

Eat What You Like.

It is a sound rule for all of us, says an eminent doctor, that with respect to food our likes and dislikes are the best guide as to what is good for us, and it is safe to eat upon the plan that whatever we relish will prove on the average harmless and wholesome, and whatever produces disgust will prove, as a general thing, indigestible. Nothing can be more wrong, for instance, than to make children eat fat, for example, when they don't want it. A healthy child likes fat and eats as much of it as he can. If he shows signs of disgust at fat that proves him to be of a bilious temperament, and he ought never to be forced to eat it against his will. A good many of us have disordered digestion in after life simply because we were compelled to eat rich food in childhood when we felt instinctively was unsuitable to us.

Origin of a Well-known Phrase.

Phrases and slang terms, says Harper's Bazaar, are frequently born of interesting episodes, as witness the following:

Peter the Great, while driving in the neighborhood of Moscow on one occasion, was seized with the pangs of hunger. "What have we in the hamper?" he asked of his aid.

"There is but one candle left, your majesty," replied the aid, "but I think I can exchange it for a fowl at the next farm house, if you wish."

"Do so," replied the czar, "for I am famished and do not care for a light luncheon."

The aid laughed, and, as he surmised, managed the exchange, but the bird was found to be unusually tough.

"I do not think, Vosky," said the emperor later, "I do not think the game was worth the candle."

Celt and Saxon.

Sheridan tells of an Irishman who met a Briton of the true John Bull pattern standing with folded arms in a contemplative mood, apparently meditating on the greatness of his little island, says the Washington Post.

"Allow me to differ with ye!" exclaimed the Celt.

"But I have said nothing, sir," exclaimed John Bull.

"But a man may think a lie as well as publish it," persisted the pugnacious Hibernian.

"Perhaps you are looking for a fight?" queried the Briton.

"Allow me to compliment yez on the quickness of your perception," said Patrick, throwing down his coat, and then they pitched in.

White deer, which were once very rare, are said now to be plentiful in eastern Maine.

What Lincoln Said.

The friends of monopolists, including J. J. Ingalls, are affirming that the saying attributed to Lincoln about the "approaching crisis that unnerved him"—meaning the rule of corporations—cannot be found in his writings.

The curious thing about it is that these lickspittles of our tyrants go on to prove that this lack of authenticity shows that Lincoln was not that sort of a man.

We believe that the passage was from a private letter to a friend. But while we are finding that let them chew on this from the artist carpenter's "Six Months in the White House."

This gave occasion for the strongest expression I ever heard from the lips of Lincoln. Knotting his face in the intensity of his feeling, he said: "Curtain, what do you think of those fellows in Wall street who are gambling in gold at such a time as this?" "They are a set of sharks," returned Curtin. "For my part," continued the president, bringing down his clenched hand upon the table, "I wish every one of them had his devilish head shot off."—Chicago Express.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The political contest for municipal offices waxes warm as the ides of March approach.

The democratic ticket in full will be found in our advertising columns. The committee of that party has seen fit to include the names of the library trustees, although no election for such officers occurs.

Timothy Lee is announced through this paper as the democratic candidate for chief of police. Mr. Lee has long been an efficient member of the police department, one time chief, and for the past two years captain of police under Chief Drew.

Matt Karcher's card as an independent candidate for chief of police appears in our columns. Mr. Karcher is an experienced officer, and has heretofore been elected chief of police as an independent candidate. He has served two terms as chief.

Major William McLaughlin is the democratic candidate for second trustee, as will appear by his card to-day. Major McLaughlin has the virtue of firmness, and has never been accused of a lack of backbone. While not the candidate of our party, he commands our respect. He always evinced the courage to do what he conceived to be right, whether any body else liked it or not.

National Editorial Association.

There will be a meeting of all persons interested in the proper reception of the national editorial association at Stockton on the fourth Tuesday of this month, the 23d. The state board of trade will join with the press associations of the state in making arrangements for the national meeting in San Francisco, and the excursions will precede and follow business sessions. Among the more prominent publishers of the country who will be with the editors here in May, Geo. W. Childs of the Philadelphia Ledger is included. He will attend the dedication ceremonies of the "Childs-Drexel Home for Union Printers" at Colorado Springs, Col., May 12th, the anniversary of his birth, coming thence to California, here to take a part in the proceedings of the national body.

The Old Scissor's Soliloquy.

I am lying at rest in the sanctum to-night—
The place is deserted and still—
To my right lie exchanges and manuscripts
white;
To my left are the ink and the quill—
Yes, the quill, for my master's old-fashioned and quaint,
And refuses to write with a pen;
He insists that old Franklin, the editor saint,
Used a quill, and he'll imitate Ben.

I love the old fellow—together for years
We have managed the Farmers' Gazette,
And although I'm old, I'm his favorite shears,
And can crowd the compositors yet;
But my duties are rather too heavy, I think,
And I often times envy the quill
As it lazily leans with its nib in the ink,
While I'm slashing away with a will.

But when I was new—I remember it well,
Though a score of long years have gone by—
The heaviest share of the editing fell
One the quill, and I think with a sigh
Of the day when I'd scissor an extract or two
From a neighboring editor's leader,
Then laugh in my sleeve at the quill as it flew
In behalf of the general reader.

I am being paid off for my merriment then,
For my master is wrinkled and gray,
And seldom lays hold on his primitive pen,
Except when he wishes to say,
"We are needing some money to run this machine,
And subscribers will please to remit;"
Or, "That last load of wood that Jones brought us was green,
And so knotty it couldn't be split."

He is nervous and deaf and getting quite blind
Though he hates to acknowledge the latter,

And I'm sorry to say it's a puzzle to find
Head or tail to the most of his matter;
The compositors plague him whenever they see

The result of a luckless endeavor
By the daring old rascal just lays it to me,
And I make no remonstrance whatever.

Yes, I shoulder the blame—very little I care
For the jolly compositor's jests,
For I think of a head with the silvery hair
That will soon, very soon, be at rest.

He has labored full long for the true and the good
"Mend the manifold troubles that irk us,"
His own emolument raiment and food,
And—a pass, now and then, to the circus.

Heigho! from the past comes a memory bright

Of a lass of the freshness of clover,
Who used me to clip from her tresses, one night,

A memorial lock for her lover.
That dear little lock is still glossy and brown,
But the lass is much older and fatter,
And the youth—he's an editor here in the town—

I am employed on the staff of the latter.

I am lying at rest in the sanctum to-night—
The place is deserted and still—
The stars are abroad and the moon is in sight
Through the trees on the brow of the hill.
Clouds hurry along in undignified haste,
And the wind rushes by with a wail—
Hello! there's a whopping big rat in the paste—

How I'd like to shunt down on his tail.

Saved by a Dream.

An instance in which a dream was useful in preventing an impending catastrophe is recorded of a daughter of Mrs. Rutherford at Elerton, the grand daughter of Sir Walter Scott. This lady dreamed more than once that her mother had been murdered by a black servant. She was so much upset by this that she returned home, and, to her great astonishment, and not a little to her dismay, she met on entering the house the very black servant she had met in her dream.
He had been engaged in her absence. She prevailed upon a gentleman to watch in an adjoining room during the following night.

About 3 o'clock in the morning the gentleman heard footsteps on the stairs, came out and met the servant carrying a quantity of coals. Being questioned as to where he was going, he answered, confusedly, that he was going to mend the mistress' fire, which, at 3 o'clock in the morning in the middle of summer, was evidently impossible. On further investigation a strong knife was found hidden in the coals. The lady escaped, but the man was subsequently hanged for murder, and before his execution he confessed that he intended to have assassinated Mrs. Rutherford.

"Brown, do you know why you are like a donkey?" "Like a donkey?" echoed Brown, opening wide his eyes. "No, I don't. 'Do you give it up?' 'I do.' 'Because your better half is stubbornness itself.' 'That's not bad. Ha! ha! I'll give that to my wife when I get home.' 'Mrs. Brown,' he asked, as he sat down to supper, 'do you know why I am so much like a donkey?' He waited a moment expecting his wife to give it up.
She looked at him somewhat commiserat-ingly as she answered: 'I suppose because you were born so.'

The Development of Reason.

The problem, whether or not man has a monopoly of the faculty of reason, seems to be as disturbing an element among philosophers and scientists as ever. The criticism by James Sully, in the Nineteenth Century, on Dr. Romanes' recent work on animal reasoning, draws out many interesting conclusions.

This much of the problem, at least, appears settled—the power of animals to form pictorial images. This is a power that seems to be possessed by all birds and quadrupeds, enabling them to recognize food, habitat and men. In the pictorial representations, moreover, there seems to be involved a process of classification or generalizing. Wild game have a generalized idea of man, and will run or fly, as they will not from other animals. A crow carries the generalization further, and distinguishes between a man with a gun and a man unarmed. Mr. Sully's monkey even grasps "unperceived abstractions," and rises to "generic ideas of principles," as when, having discovered the way to take the handle out of the hearth brush by unscrewing it, his monkeyship then proceeds to apply the principle of the screw to the handle of the fire shovel, poker, and bell.

The nominalist school of psychologists find that the difference between man and animals is the power of language, which enables us, by the use of class-symbols, to note down and keep distinct the results of successive comparisons and analyses. Dr.
Romanes and Mr. Sully, however, think that, while language may profoundly assist, it is not absolutely necessary to the power of generalizing, or even of symbolizing.
The case is given of a parrot that barked whenever it saw a certain noisy dog. This sign of denotation was afterward applied to other dogs, as the parrot came to recognize barking as a common attribute of the dog species. A parallel is cited in the case of the child that applied "dada" to all men, or calls all bright objects stars. The recognition of signs is illustrated in the ox that obeys "gee" and "haw," in the horse that minds "whoa" and "get up," and in the dog who sometimes acquiesces, so to speak, a vocabulary embracing "charge," "speak,"
"pray," "sleep," "eat," "rats," "go fetch,"
"hunt 'em up," etc.

The generic image Mr. Sully considers the first and important stepping stone across the "unfordable Rubicon." "The child that dreams and imagines," says he, "is already a different being from the infant that merely touches and sees." Anyone who has watched a sleeping dog and noticed how the animal will at times during his slumbers alternately wag his tail, pant, lick his jaws, and sometimes bark aloud, is ready to testify to canine dreaming. Whether or not this dreaming in sleep-moments extends to full fledged imagination in waking moments, is another thing. It would appear, however, that we will have to credit our Sheps and Brunos with the possession, at least, of fancy. The fleeting images of bones, beef-steaks, hostile dogs and neighbors' cats, which pass through the canine brain, may be to the canine life—who knows?—all that the images of pretty girls, pretty bonnets, fine dinners, and balls are to the life of the society leader. With the faculties of dog Bruno and beau Brummel it may be as Milton describes it, alike true:

Among these Fancy next
Her office holds; of all external things
Which the five watchful senses represent
She forms imaginations, very shapes.

Another Girl's Sweetheart.

You are pretty, you are young, you are a little bit of a coquette, and you have just met somebody's else sweetheart, writes Ruth Ashmore in her monthly "Side Talks With Girls," in the February Ladies' Home Journal. It is all right to be merry, but if you are the girl I think you are you will not give those coquettish glances, those tender words and those indescribable but flattering suggestions to him. You may be prettier than the girl he loves; don't try to make him conscious of that; you may be brighter and wit-tier and able to make him feel more at ease, but never for an instant let him dream of this. Don't let his meeting with you be one that he will not care to tell her about; but rather act so that when you let the white curtains down over your big, bright eyes it will be with an easy conscience, or you will know that he has gone back to the girl he loves, and that he has told her of your kindness, of your courtesy, and that he has ended by saying: "Yet with it all, my dearest, you were ever before me and I never forgot you." Then you will have one other woman who is your friend, for she will know what you could have done, and she will respect you for your honor and good will.

Too Smart.

"Do you keep corn meal?" inquired the man with the basket on his arm.
"No, sir," said the grocer. "We sell it.
How much do you want?"
"Did I say I wanted any?" mildly asked the man with the basket.
And he went out and hunted up another grocery store where the salesmen were not quite so smart.

MRS. GRAHAM'S

Cucumber
and Elder Flower
Cream

Is not a cosmetic in the sense in which that term
is popularly used, but permanently beautifies. It creates a soft, smooth, clear, velvety skin, and by daily use gradually makes the complexion several shades whiter. It is a constant protection from the effects of sun and wind and prevents sunburn and freckles, and blackheads will never come while you use it. It cleanses the face far better than soap and water, nourishes and builds up the skin tissues and thus prevents the formation of wrinkles. It gives the freshness, clearness and smoothness of skin that you had when a little girl. Every lady, young or old, ought to use it, as it gives a more youthful appearance to any lady, and that permanently. It contains no acid, powder or alkali, and is as harmless as dew, and as nourishing to the skin as dew is to the flower. Price, $1.00, at all druggists and hairdressers, or at Mrs. Gervaise Graham's establishment, 103 Post street, San Francisco, where she treats
ladies for all blemishes of the face or figure. Ladies at a distance treated by letter. Send stamp for her

A Legend of St. Valentine.

Saint Valentine, in days of yore,
Was walking by a river,
When he chanced on Cupid, weeping sore,
With scattered darts and quiver.

And straight the dear saint questioned him
Why he with grief was laden,
And Cupid told, with eyesight dim,
Of willful man and maiden.

The hearts of some he could not pierce—
With laugh and scorn they hailed him—
Though long his onslaught was, and fierce,
His wonted wiles all failed him.

"Go bring me some papyrus rolls,"
Saint Valentine commanded;
The cherub hastened with the scrolls,
With silken wings expanded.

"The spirit of song we'll prison here
That breathes of love and flowers;
Of softest eyes and ripe lips near,
And swiftly-passing hours.

"Go strew the rolls; when love doth sing
Heart-doors are all down-shaken;
Then throw your darts." He spread his wing—
That night each heart was taken!

L'ENVOI.

Cupid you may withstand for a time,
But not both Cupid and Valentine.

Warned.

"No, I don't believe in ghosts," said a locomotive engineer on one of the trunk lines running out of Kansas City. "Most of the phenomena we run across can be explained, and of those that can't the majority are due to illness. One of the strangest incidents in my life occurred while I was running an engine on the Chicago and Alton, from Slater to Roodhouse.

"You know there is a little station near Centralia, Mo., called Clark, where the Chicago and Alton and the Wabash cross. At this crossing we always have to come to a full stop, and, though I have gone over it a thousand times, I never go over it without a shudder.

"Whenever I take an engine over that crossing a lady's voice, as gentle and as clear as a silver bell, always says to me, plainly and distinctly, 'All right; go ahead.' There have been only three times that this has not been done. Once, in 1883, she said to me:

"Stop; wait a minute!"

"So accustomed had I become to obeying her that I stopped at once at the unusual command. Looking ahead I saw by my headlight that a man had caught his foot in the frog just ahead and would have been crushed if I had gone ahead. I didn't tell him why I had stopped, for I had no desire to have it published.

"After that, for a year, everything went as usual. One day, after I had come to a dead standstill, and had started up again, the lady's voice said to me, in quick, anxious tones:

"Stop! Wait a minute! You'll be too late! Reverse!"

"I followed her commands as quickly as possible, and a little golden-haired fairy was picked up from just in front of the wheels of the locomotive.

"Now, the strangest part of all this is the fact that no one ever heard these commands of warning except me. When the superintendent later sent for me to give me a check from the child's mother, he asked me the facts, and I told him the whole story just as it existed. He looked at me a little queerly when I got through, and said:

"You have been too long with us, and are too serviceable for us to want to lose you, but we can't have any stories like this circulating. It will injure our service too badly."

"I suggested that only twice had it interfered with my run for a half minute, and in both cases had saved a life, but this did no good, and I saw that a repetition of yielding to my imagination, as he called it, would probably mean my resignation. When I next approached the Clark switch and crossing, I was very nervous and felt that my imagination was just in condition to serve me any sort of a trick.

"We started, and as I started up again I heard that voice I knew so well say, with perfect distinction:

"Stop! wait a minute!"

"But instead of doing so I gave her more steam, and as we went forward I imagined I heard the engine crying something, and I know I heard the warning voice in tears, crying, 'Oh, dear! Oh, dear!'

"When I came back on my return I learned that our train had run over an old man, who had lived a few minutes, but was never identified.

"I went over the run once or twice afterward, but the heartrending cry of 'Oh, dear! Oh, dear!' rings in my ear every time I go past Clark, and so I told the superintendent and handed in my resignation."

"And yet you don't believe in ghosts?" said a listener.

"No," he replied. "Of course I can't explain this, but it must have some reasonable explanation."
